Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the gentleman from Wyoming know that the message of Gov. Hughes to the Legislature of the State of New York opposing the ratification of the income-tax amendment was a rehash of all the briefs that had been transmitted to Congress by the representatives of predatory wealth while that amendment was under consideration?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, if he will refresh his memory, or inquire of some one who is familiar with what was happening in Congress at that time, he will learn that it is the fact.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, that is one of the fancies and fallacies of my genial friend from New York. I do not know that to be the fact for the very excellent reason that it is not the fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is the fact, and I made some caustic comments myself on it at the time.

Mr. MONDELL. The real and important fact remains that when our Democratic friends came to draft their bill they were very careful to draft it so that it would not be subject to the criticism and would not contain the faults pointed out by Gov.—President-to-be—Hughes.

Mr. Chairman, coming back to the bill, I want to say this, because later it may be discussed in connection with this bill, that the commission, when it came to go over the ground that had been laid out for the extension of Rock Creek Park, found that there was a tract between the Q Street Bridge and the Calvert Street Bridge that it had been proposed to take in under the original plans that they concluded was not necessary. Under the language of the provision of this bill the commission can modify the plans so as to exclude those lands or any other lands they feel may be excluded without injury to the plan, and without in any way injuriously affecting the beauty and value of the park. There has been some criticism of the exclusion of those lands, but the fact seems to be that the lands in question are not really needed for park purposes. They are lands that may be built upon, and the commission concluded that it would be a useless expenditure of public money to include them in the park.

In all, $722,200.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If my figures are correct, last year there was appropriated $115,500 for this item, and this year it carries $722,200. What do we manufacture in the Frankford Arsenal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Small-arms ammunition, small-artillery ammunition, and optical instruments.

Mr. COX. It is proposed to add new pieces of artillery ammunition to be manufactured this year. Have we manufactured field artillery ammunition heretofore?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are manufacturing some there now.

Mr. COX. We have been doing that heretofore?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and this money will so equip the plant as to make the manufacture more complete and economical in the long run. What was done in connection with these arsenals was this: The committee recognized that there was a very considerable sentiment in the House for the manufacture by the Government of munitions and war materials. It made a very exhaustive investigation, both in the preparation of the fortifications appropriation bill and in the preparation of this bill, of what the Government is doing and what its plants were capable of and what it would be wise from the standpoint of the Government to do toward enlarging the capacities of these plants. It ascertained that it would take about $75,000,000 to provide plants sufficient to supply all of the various materials required for the Army in time of war. No one suggested that Congress desired or would consent to such a great investment, but we had these various plants, and by certain expenditures their capacity could either be enlarged or their facilities so improved that very desirable advantages would come therefrom.

Mr. COX. With this enlargement of the arsenal at this place, on account of this additional appropriation, will it be sufficient to supply the Government with the amount of munitions of war which we are now using, especially in time of peace; or if not, what per cent of it would that supply?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that so far as this field-artillery ammunition is concerned this plant, and the plant it is proposed to establish at the Rock Island Arsenal, each of them working one shift a day, will supply all the peace needs of the Government. This plant now, as I recall it, is working two shifts a day. It is not considered advantageous to operate these plants three shifts a day at all, but this plant and the plant to be established at the Rock Island Arsenal will only be operating one shift a day. For instance, certain studies made by the War College here were to the effect that if the United States were at war with a great power, with a million men in the field, they would require 50,000 rounds of field-artillery ammunition a day. Of course that contemplates situations something like those existing in Europe.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will ask to be recognized for a moment or two. We provide a plant at the Rock Island Arsenal with the capacity of 5,000 rounds a day, and this is to provide facilities for the existing plant, so as to round it out, and to make economical the operation of the plant that now exists. The committee thought it wise to do it at this time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $85,500.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, an estimate was submitted for the purchase of additional land at Picatinny Arsenal for the sum of $10,000, if I recollect rightly. There had been an offer made the War Department some time ago of this tract of land at $7,500. The committee agreed to the item reducing the sum, however, to the amount of the offer made some time ago. I was informed this morning by the secretary of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CAPSTICK], who is not able to be here, that since that offer of $7,500 was made there have been considerable improvements put upon this tract of land, and that the probability is the parties would not agree or be justified in selling for $7,500. I will ask if the gentleman from New York would have any objection to passing this over until perhaps to-morrow that I might get that information, if the information is available, as to these improvements?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should we increase the price? Nobody is putting improvements on land that juts into a powder factory.

Mr. MONDELL. It is or was a farm, if the chairman recalls, and the land has been held——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am somewhat opposed to it; if a man should get $7,500 for land there he would be like John D. Rockefeller——

Mr. MONDELL. It is of considerable acreage, if the gentleman remembers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not large, and it is at the rate of about $125 an acre.

Mr. MONDELL. I admit I have no information other than the information that the committee has, except what I hear to-day, as I have suggested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The information given by Gen. Crozier never indicated that anybody had improved it at all. There is no special reason for us to have it except that it is not wisdom to have this land jutting in, and the more we develop that plant the less desirable it would be to have either a farm or a country residence within shooting distance of a very dangerous and hazardous powder factory.

Mr. MONDELL. Adjacent to a powder factory is not a choice place for a farm; but a farmer was there before the powder factory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are only some 50 acres——

Mr. MONDELL. Fifty-seven acres, as I recollect.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At about $150 an acre. Why, you ought to buy half the State of New Jersey, almost, for that amount.

Mr. MONDELL. I have seen a considerable part of New Jersey for which I would think that was a very high price.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should think that any land jutting pretty well into a powder plant would be pretty well paid for at $150 an acre.

Mr. MONDELL. However, we should not take advantage of a Jerseyman because we built a powder factory near his farm.

Mr. MANN. I would say to the gentleman from Wyoming that if he thinks the Government is going to take advantage of a Jerseyman in a land deal he has still to become acquainted with the natives of New Jersey. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I understand the gentleman does not think it best to pass the matter over?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to pass this matter over. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not make that request; it will only encourage them to think we are going to be extravagant——

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. One minute, Mr. Chairman—unless the gentleman is really anxious about the matter.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will let it pass over until to-morrow, and then if I do not get the information that I have in mind it will be disposed of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let it pass over, with the understanding that if it is not disposed of to-morrow it will not be returned to.

Mr. MONDELL. Very well——

Mr. MANN. Well, hardly. I can not see my friend from Wyoming taken advantage of in this way, because this bill will not be up until Thursday.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, when the bill is taken up—that is, to-morrow, as far as this bill is concerned—the next day we take up the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to passing the item over.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the item will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Powder factory: For the establishment of a plant for the manufacture of powder on a site to be procured by purchase or condemnation, or in the discretion of the Secretary of War on any suitable site that may be tendered without cost to the United States which he is authorized to accept, $500,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order—well, I make the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not make it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires, I will reserve it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman the purpose of this item. The Picatinny Arsenal at present has a capacity of 1,800,000 pounds of powder a year. By the appropriations made in this bill the capacity will be increased to 3,300,000 pounds a year. Five hundred thousand dollars will provide a plant for a capacity of 1,700,000 pounds, giving, all told, an annual capacity of 5,000,000 pounds. At the normal rate before war prices that would save——

Mr. MANN. This is to be in connection with the powder plant we have there now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the proposition is to establish this at some place else. It is not believed desirable to concentrate all the powder-making capacity of the Government too near the coast. It is believed more desirable to leave the location to the War Department. It might be desirable to locate this plant reasonably near the nitrate plant that is to be established. At any rate, it is the belief that it is desirable to locate this plant west of the Alleghenies as a matter of protection.

And the saving, on the best estimates, alone on powder, if it is only 10 cents a pound, will be over half a million dollars.

Mr. MANN. How much is this plant to cost?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Five hundred thousand dollars will give us a plant of an annual capacity of 1,700,000 pounds. The Picatinny Arsenal, with the money appropriated in this bill, will have a capacity of 3,300,000 pounds.

Mr. MANN. There is no limitation in this item. It does not have the estimates of the plant. You are to commence a plant for half a million dollars.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, the testimony was clear that with $500,000 a plant could be completed with a capacity that has been indicated by the gentleman from New York, and while there is no limitation there is no power to incur any additional obligation, and there is no question that the Chief of Ordnance, under whom would come the expenditure of the money, would in good faith create a plant not to cost in excess of that amount.

Mr. MANN. I presume he would try to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not a matter, if the gentleman will permit, of estimates.

Mr. MANN. There is no limitation.

Mr. SHERLEY. No. It is not a matter of estimate, because we have not only built a plant but have recently added to it.

Mr. MANN. Why is not there a limit in there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the only reason. This is to provide a plant having a capacity of 1,700,000 pounds a year. It may be desirable in the future to enlarge that plant. It seemed to everyone who looked into the matter to give them the money for a capacity of so much was sufficient.

The powder we have been purchasing at 53 cents a pound is now selling to the European Governments for over $1 a pound. We make it for about 38 cents a pound; but it will cost more to make, because some of the elements which enter into the manufacture will be increased; but we may be faced immediately with the situation, unless we manufacture our own powder, that the cost under existing conditions will be prohibitive.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is another thing that ought to be said, and that is that the shipment of nitrate is not a very easy or inexpensive matter—that is, manufactured nitrate for use in powder—and if we are going to establish a very large nitrate plant it will probably be very much in the interest of economy to establish near or immediately adjoining it a powder factory so as to avoid the cost of shipping the nitrate.

Mr. MANN. That is what had occurred to me. We have provided an authorization for a $20,000,000 nitrate plant, which certainly will not be definitely located during the next fiscal year.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am not at all sure of that, but certainly the department has in mind the location of the powder plant with particular relation to a nitrate plant.

Mr. MANN. Very well. No one knows where the nitrate plant will be, while everybody knows that under the Army reorganization bill the nitrate plant will go to Muscle Shoals. I am inclined to think that you can put a plant there at Muscle Shoals under the Army reorganization bill. Now, if we are going to establish a new powder plant, should it not be established in connection with or adjacent to any nitrate plant? Suppose we put a nitrate plant way out West?

Mr. SHERLEY. I am inclined to think that is true, but we did not feel that we ought to put a direction in to that effect. Presumably the ordnance people will have that in mind. I know from some talks with Gen. Crozier about matters that he has in mind the location of the powder plant in relation to the nitrate plant, so as to save the undue expense of shipping the nitrate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think I will make a point of order. What is half a million dollars these days?

Mr. SHERLEY. Seriously, aside from the question of nitrate, we will save in five or six years one-half a million dollars on the cost of the powder.

Mr. MANN. Of course I think the gentleman is in error about that. I do not think we will make powder any cheaper than we could buy it.

Mr. SHERLEY. We buy it at 53 cents, and we make it for less than 43 cents.

Mr. MANN. I really question whether the gentleman is correct about that. I have no doubt he thinks he is correct, however.

Mr. SHERLEY. I conducted quite elaborate hearings on the subject, and the figures there were never challenged.

Mr. MANN. I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the gentleman, but I doubt very much if the Government does anything as cheaply as it can hire it done or can manufacture anything as cheaply as it can buy it. I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to say that anything we manufacture in these arsenals we can manufacture cheaper than we can buy it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask a question, if the Chair does not object. Let me reserve a point of order for the purpose of getting information. The paragraph provides that this powder plant shall be established, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, "on any suitable site that may be donated without cost to the Government, which he is authorized to accept." That would imply that some site had already been agreed upon.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is believed that perhaps some localities would be so eager to get one of these dangerous powder plants near it that they would be glad to donate a site.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Philadelphia wanted this additional sum in order to get these magazines. What the gentleman from Kentucky said was that the Chief of Ordnance had in mind in the location of this plant that it would be desirable to locate it relatively near the nitrate plant, or at such a place that the transportation of the nitrate in its manufactured form to be utilized in the manufacture of powder would not necessitate long and expensive hauls. It might perhaps be possible to find a place where it could all be done by water transportation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is this a part of a policy to move the arsenals and ammunition-making establishments from the coasts into the interior of the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; because in this bill we are providing very liberally both for Picatinny, Frankford, Watervliet, and Watertown Arsenals. We are increasing the capacity of the Picatinny Arsenal from 1,800,000 pounds to 3,300,000 pounds.

It was stated that a plant to provide 1,700,000 pounds annually could be provided for half a million dollars, and that it would be more desirable to locate that some place else than at Picatinny, for strategical reasons, and that there was no economy of manufacture by concentrating the manufacture at Picatinny.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume that the committee had adopted a policy—it has been discussed publicly anyhow—or that there is a disposition to remove these munition-making establishments, so far as the Government controls them, from the coast line to the interior, partly because of aerial navigation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If these establishments were to be located now, I have not the slightest doubt that they would all be located west of the Allegheny Mountains. The plants at Philadelphia, Watervliet, Watertown, Picatinny, and Springfield are all within the possibilities, if such a situation should arise, of an aerial raid from a hostile fleet on our coast. They would not be vulnerable to such an attack if they were located west of the Alleghenies. At the time when they were located, there was very little danger of an overland attack that would be successful, and we had not contemplated the aeroplane, the dirigible, or the Zeppelin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if fighting is to be done, it probably will be done somewhere along the coast line, and there is where the ammunition will be needed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, well, the ammunition can be shipped. The security of the place of manufacture is an important consideration. If Philadelphia should be captured by some of these alien forces of which so much is heard, they would have our very nice little establishment there ready to supply them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think New York would be more apt to be captured first, if there was going to be any capturing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they would be more likely to try New York. They would not waste much time on Philadelphia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should hope not; but I observe that the committee has increased the facilities for the manufacture of field artillery ammunition at the Frankford Arsenal——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the Chair rule that it was too late to make the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice that while the committee allowed $175,000 for increasing the facilities at the Frankford Arsenal for the manufacture of field artillery ammunition, it provides for the making of contracts for $1,250,000 for providing facilities, which I assume are for the manufacture of field artillery at Rock Island Arsenal, and a direct appropriation of $500,000.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, here is the exact situation: As to all the existing arsenals, where it was considered economical and desirable to enlarge their capacity as going concerns, we made appropriations for that purpose; but in the judgment of the War Department none of those arsenals near the eastern seaboard are desirable from the standpoint of safety of location; and therefore when it came to a proposition of erecting what was practically a new plant, we did not undertake to place it at any of the arsenals east of the Alleghenies. I have no doubt that it will be the policy of the War Department in the future, in enlarging the arsenal capacity of the country, to look to places more in the interior for the establishment of such new plants as may be required, rather than greatly to enlarge the existing plants east of the Alleghenies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a very clear statement, and I thank the gentleman for it. But so long as we have been referring to aerial navigation, and the danger that would arise from having our ammunition plants near the coast line, because of that fact may I suggest that aerial navigation would very largely follow the line of rivers, and that it is possible that aerial navigation from Canada would make a central point like Rock Island almost as vulnerable as Picatinny or Frankford or Springfield. That matter has been discussed by some experts who have been looking at it from a different angle than have our friends from the interior.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was not a question of pressure from anybody from the interior. We have simply accepted what seems to be the general viewpoint of the Army officials, that it is not desirable to continue to center upon the eastern shores of America the arsenal plants of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To what extent are we building up the arsenals on the Pacific coast relatively?

Mr. SHERLEY. In this bill we are doing absolutely nothing in that regard, and we have no manufacturing arsenals upon the Pacific coast. We have certain arsenals there, but they are simply used for making repairs and as warehouses and distribution centers, and not as manufacturing plants.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has it been suggested to the committee that if we are going to build plants in the interior we should also build them on the Pacific coast?

Mr. SHERLEY. No argument has been presented to us by the War Department for the establishment on the Pacific coast of manufacturing arsenals.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Provision is made in this bill for San Antonio. Is this to cover the Gulf area?

Mr. SHERLEY. The San Antonio Arsenal is simply a distribution arsenal and not a manufacturing plant. The situation in regard to Mexico, not simply now but the possibilities for the future, made it desirable to have larger storage facilities there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman regards this plan as a comprehensive and fair one in the matter of distribution?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the committee has not discriminated against any arsenal. The estimate for the Frankford Arsenal aggregated $491,000. This bill carries items aggregating $722,000, so that the committee did more than the department asked for by over $200,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no fault to find with what the committee has done for the Frankford Arsenal. As one of the Philadelphia Representatives, I highly appreciate it. I am calling attention, however, to the fact that Rock Island, although in the interior, is also vulnerable to aerial navigation, and that it receives $1,200,000 in one item for field-artillery ammunition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true because it is for an entirely new plant. It was desirable to have such a plant at Rock Island as it has a water power there which is a cheaper power than steam power, with ample land unoccupied and desirably located.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has Rock Island a number of buildings that can be utilized for this purpose?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has not. It has certain buildings erected for shops and now utilized for warehouses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the powder plant that the Government is to create to be located at Rock Island?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not thought that it would be desirable to put it there because of objections that might be made to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am finding no fault with the committee. These are fair questions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The location of it there is not being considered on account of the objection that would probably be made by the people of the vicinity. Explosions take place in connection with powder manufactories. Powder explodes every once in a while, and somebody may be injured. The people have an idea that a powder factory adjacent to a community is very dangerous. The Chief of Ordnance said very frankly that he doubted the expediency of locating a powder plant at Rock Island. However, anybody who wants it can apply for it. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Rock Island Arsenal, Rock Island, Ill.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The House has entered on a little larger plan of military preparedness than we have ever had before. The policy of providing for the manufacturing in our own arsenals is not particularly new, but it has been growing, and at the present state of public opinion there will be a very general demand throughout the country that as much as possible of the munitions of war necessary to supply the Army and Navy shall be made at the Government arsenals or under direct Government supervision. There is a strong and a very proper feeling, I think, that there should be no private profit in the furnishing of the munitions of war to our own Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to assert that private manufacturers employed in manufacturing munitions for the Government ought not to receive any profit at all?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not think the gentleman misunderstood me; I do not see how he could have misunderstood me.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was what the gentleman said.

Mr. BORLAND. No; it was not what I said. Wherever the Government contracts for material or supplies with private manufacturers they ought to have a fair profit, but there is a feeling on the part of the country that there is a temptation to create a demand for munitions of war because of the private profits that exist. I doubt not that the gentleman from Wisconsin concurs in the opinion.

Mr. STAFFORD. I question that that sentiment exists except in view of the few politicians who represent districts with arsenals in them.

Mr. BORLAND. I can assure the gentleman that such a feeling exists. The committee had no intention of establishing a larger number of new arsenals to manufacture supplies, for obvious reasons. They are not needed. We have now arsenals that, with proper development and increased improvement, will be able to supply the entire Army with ordinary supplies in time of peace and provide a reasonable reserve for any hostilities. So the problem was one of picking out an arsenal that could be improved profitably and economically for the Government. One of the places we found we could improve was at Rock Island, Ill., and I need not remind the gentleman that it is not in my district. I visited Rock Island during the consideration of this bill, and it is one of the best located arsenals we have. It has a number of buildings that are pretty old, I think, built in 1871; they are of heavy stone structure, and the only difficulty is that the floors are low. They are not constructed for the heavy traveling cranes that are necessary in the construction of large cannon and gun carriages, but are very well adapted to the manufacture of saddles and saddlery for cavalry equipment, artillery carriages, and so forth. All that sort of equipment used in the Army is now made there. It is the purpose to erect a new building for the manufacture and assemblement of field artillery. We have ample land, and, in addition, the Government owns a 9,000 water horsepower, of which we use only 4,000; in other words, we have more than twice the horsepower that we now use, while we have three large cities within a consuming radius that would take any surplus. Then there are private plants up and down the river from which we could get any additional power we wanted. It is situated on an island in the Mississippi River, reached by bridges, and a place where intruders can be kept out. In addition to this is the fact that a new arsenal will go to the West, because trouble is liable to come from the West as well as from any other source.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. It was thought desirable instead of creating any new arsenals in the West among the number of locations that might be selected, to enlarge in the particular way of service needs this Rock Island Arsenal, and we have provided for its enlargement by the creation of this new building. This new building, of course, will be adapted to modern conditions. It will be the class of building where a traveling crane can be used, and where labor-saving machinery can be put in, and these larger and heavier guns and carriages can be handled by machinery instead of by hand. That is the occasion for the enlargement of the Rock Island Arsenal. We have not any manufacturing arsenals west of Rock Island. Everything to the west of that, to the Pacific coast, must draw its supplies from at least as far east as Rock Island. It has also been called to the attention of the House that we enlarged in a way the Chief of Ordnance thought was desirable and economical the existing arsenals in the East. No arsenal is to be dismantled. Each is to be developed to the full extent to which it is serviceable to the country. On the general policy of manufacturing our own ammunition, personally I would be glad to see us make every pound of ammunition that we need in case of war, yet I realize if we got into a sure-enough war, a real war with a tremendous first-class power, it would be necessary to mobilize all of our industrial establishments, and possibly press them all into the service. We would only be manufacturing what was the initial reserve for a war of that kind, but while we are manufacturing only the initial reserve in time of peace, we are fixing the standard price which we find beyond question is below the price that is bid by the private contractors. In every case in the matter of saddlery, canteens, knapsacks, and the equipment that is made there at Rock Island, the price of manufacture there is below what the price of private contract would be, so that in time of peace we are supplying ourselves at a minimum price. In time of war we would have a nucleus for expansion into a much larger service, with the addition of the industrial plants in private ownership.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The entire plan of preparedness as suggested by everyone who has given any attention to it has been upon the theory that it is possible that the Atlantic coast of the United States may be attacked by a foreign power. The Navy was increased upon that theory, and the greatest appropriation in the history of the world in time of peace was made for it. The Army was increased upon that very theory to defend against an attack upon the Atlantic coast, and yet if that attack should be made you can imagine what would happen at the Springfield Arsenal, at the Frankford Arsenal, at Watervliet, at the powder factories in New Jersey, and at City Point, Va. Aerial service is being so perfected that if that attack ever comes every one of those plants may disappear in a night, and with all of our Army and with all of our Navy we might be helpless in face of the enemy. I do not represent an arsenal and do not live within 250 miles of the Rock Island Arsenal, but, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] truly said, there is no place west of the Mississippi River where anything can be made to supply the Army. We have only one arsenal in the interior of the country, only one place where anything can be made to supply the Army. One of the greatest difficulties that France has in this war is that a number of the arsenals in northern France went into the hands of the enemy. Even the Krupp gun works are only 90 miles away from the French frontier, and Woolwich Arsenal is only 6 miles from London. In case any of those countries are invaded, the first thing that would happen is the destruction of all places where the Army may be supplied. There should be arsenals and storehouses established in places secure from attack. The Army should be supplied, and we should run no risk of having at the water's edge the very means of preparedness in case we were called upon to defend the country.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the gentleman in mind at this time such a place?

Mr. TAGGART. I do not know but that the interior of Michigan would suit me quite as well as it would the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I was not thinking of that, but I was thinking of the matter seriously. Has the gentleman figured out a good place?

Mr. TAGGART. Yes; I have. Any place west of the Allegheny Mountains is a good deal better than Bridgeport, Conn., Philadelphia, any place near Wilmington, Del., or City Point, Va.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I think the gentleman is right about that, but I was wondering if he had not been listening to the testimony——

Mr. TAGGART. I have the honor to live in the great manufacturing city west of the Mississippi, and if it is placed there, even the gentleman from Michigan would not complain of the location. I am not working for an arsenal for my town, but I think it is absolutely silly to allow both parties to go before the country upon the issue of preparedness by one party and more preparedness by the other and then offer to the enemy at the first point of attack the very means of preparedness itself—the arsenals of the country.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I simply want to suggest that the Watervliet Arsenal is 160 miles from New York, and the English arsenals are nearer to the German aerodromes than that at the present time, and yet, so far as we know, they have not been destroyed.

Mr. TAGGART. That is quite true, and you will also realize, and according to information I get every day from New York, that aerial service is in its infancy, and they are now preparing to make it one of the branches of the military service.

And if Watervliet is only 160 miles from New York City it is within four hours of attack from the air in the case of an invasion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In case anything can fly around loose long enough.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I draw the gentleman's attention to the Mississippi River and the possibility of aeroplanes following it from the Canadian border. Does not the gentleman think it would be easy for English aeroplanes to reach the Rock Island Arsenal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. How about the Rio Grande?

Mr. TAGGART. Rock Island is nearly 600 miles from the Canadian border.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is mistaken as to water routes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think that Kansas is too near to the Mexican border to be safe there?

Mr. TAGGART. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois, for whose knowledge of geography I have the highest respect, will allow me I will simply take occasion to inform him and the committee both that the geographical center of continental United States is precisely 200 miles northwest of Kansas City.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will permit, the center of population as found by the United States Government officials by the census of 1910 is located in Bloomington, Ind., in the second congressional district, and in the yard of the Showers Bros. manufacturing plant where they have erected a monument on the identical spot.

Mr. TAGGART. I never suspected until now; while I knew it was the seat of statesmanship and wisdom, I never realized until now it was the center of population in 1910.

Mr. MANN. It is the center of wisdom, anyhow.

Mr. TAGGART. But be that as it may, the center of safety everybody will admit is the farthest distance from any one of our coasts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is cheerful for the coasts. If the gentleman will permit another question——

Mr. TAGGART. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose such an ammunition plant in one of the coastal States has been seized by the enemy and the American forces are without ammunition, must they run out to Rock Island and back before they can defend themselves?

Mr. TAGGART. Well, I beg leave to say Rock Island is only 24 hours from Washington.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If an enemy seized an arsenal, he would probably get the railroads. Does not the gentleman think it is more convenient for the army in the field along the coast line to have an establishment near by than to have to go West to get their ammunition?

Mr. TAGGART. If we had no depot left, it would not be convenient, and if the enemy should gain a lodgment on the coast you would not have any Frankford Arsenal or any Springfield Arsenal. And you would not have any powder factory, would you?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What does the gentleman think the Army and Navy would be doing all that time?

Mr. TAGGART. I do not know. Armies and navies have not been able to destroy aircraft.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why did we provide these powder plants where they are, and why do private munition establishments locate along the coast line? Why is that?

Mr. TAGGART. Because the business originated there. The skilled labor was there, and until now they did not think of danger. The Springfield Arsenal was located away from the coast purposely by Washington himself. Harpers Ferry Arsenal was located and the site was selected by the first President of the United States, and both were established in 1797. This Government never thought of such a thing as patronizing private manufacture of munitions of war until the Civil War occurred. The arsenals were set back where it was thought they would be safe. The Harpers Ferry Arsenal was put in a defensible place beyond the first range of the Blue Ridge Mountains. It was set that far from the water to protect it against attack. But in the progress of military science a matter of a hundred miles or so makes no difference. Everybody will admit that these arsenals near the coast can be destroyed, and if we are attacked and we are not successful they would be destroyed. If the enemy does not get on or near our shores they will not be destroyed, but if a fleet comes near our shores we may be without ammunition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this question of preparedness, the center of population, and statesmanship be closed in five minutes—all those cognate subjects.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the experience of Europe entirely justifies the position taken by the gentleman from Kansas with respect to the dangers of destruction from airships. As a matter of fact, one of the very great disappointments of the European campaign, from the standpoint of those who believed that aircraft would be very destructive, has grown out of the fact that aircraft have proved of slight effectiveness in destroying forts, fortifications, arsenals, and so forth. The war-munition manufacturing establishments of all the European countries are within a stone's throw, compared with our distances, of the frontiers of the enemy, and yet none of them have been destroyed or even seriously injured. But I agree with my friend from Kansas that it is well to be as safe as possible, and that the farther inland you get the less danger there is of destruction by enemy aircraft. I am rather inclined to the opinion that you could find no better place for ammunition factories than Kansas, so far as safety from aircraft is concerned. Not only is it far from any coast, but what manipulator of aircraft would ever dare the air currents of Kansas! [Laughter.] What man that every flew a Zeppelin or a heavier-than-air machine would attempt to cross a country frequented by Kansas cyclones? I am certain that that is the safest place in all the world for institutions of this sort.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman will admit, will he not, that in the terrestrial paradise called Wyoming there is at least one air artist who is a shining success? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I was just coming to the question of the desirability of Wyoming. The place to establish these plants for the manufacture of nitrates, and adjacent thereto powder factories, and so forth, is in the mountains, where we have cheap water power or the opportunity for the development of cheap water power. When we discussed the matter of a $20,000,000 appropriation for a nitrate plant I had hoped that our splendid mountain streams might be considered in that connection. We have in the State that I have the honor to represent here one great water power already developed as part of a reclamation project that could be harnessed up at an expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars, with every one of the products necessary in the manufacture of fertilizer, as well as the finest air in the world from which to draw nitrates, and we could build a nitrate plant there for a very small fraction of the $20,000,000, and a powder plant adjacent thereto, far inland and safe from all attack, absolutely not reachable by aircraft from the east by reason of the barrier of the Kansas cyclone-swept prairies or from the west by reason of the barrier of the mountains.

Mr. BORLAND. That is one advantage—that it is not reachable——

Mr. MONDELL. By aircraft.

Mr. BORLAND. But the gentleman would not spoil the beauty of the Shoshone Canyon, would he, by putting in a fertilizer plant or a nitrate factory?

Mr. MONDELL. If the structures were of the proper, ornate, and artistic character, we would get along with them, hoping that they would not mar the natural beauty of the scene and would add to the other advantages of the region.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For one railroad car for shipping 16-inch and 14-inch guns between Watervliet and Watertown Arsenals and the Sandy Hook Proving Ground, $14,000.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 65, after line 6, insert: "For the repair of one public road running through the arsenal grounds, $10,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. I should like to know on what ground the gentleman reserves his point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. On the ground that there is no authority of law to spend money for the repair of public roads.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I should like the patient attention of the committee, at least, to the merits of this proposition. The road which is sought to be improved may be called a public road, and it may possibly be truthfully said that the title to the road is not in the Government, but I hardly think that. The portion of the highway which is sought to be improved is 1,620 feet long. The Government owns both sides of the highway, and the highway runs through the Government grounds. The road is in a dangerous condition. I do not say simply that it is in a bad condition, but it is in a dangerous condition, and the interest which prompts me to speak is not the local interest, although the local interest is great.

The Government is seriously handicapped and embarrassed by the absence of a decent highway at this point. The dangerous condition of the highway is due more possibly to the heavy trucking that is necessary to and from this arsenal than to any other cause. The highway was built 25 years ago, and the Government at that time paid its portion as a property owner. At that time it owned both sides of the highway.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does not the owner of the land on each side of the highway own to the center of the highway?

Mr. SANFORD. I will come to that. The Government being an owner on both sides of the highway does not in theory own the highway but owns the easement.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It owns the land subject to the right of way?

Mr. SANFORD. It happens that the title is in the city. The street originally belonged to an old turnpike company, and the city bought the company and the highway. The difference between the easement and the fee in that highway is really, when you get down to it, a difference in quantity of title and not in quality. I think it would be a very narrow view that would claim that the Government does not own that highway as a matter of fact. The Government can not afford to say it does not own it. The Government can not maintain that arsenal without absolute ownership of the easement in that highway.

And the further reason that I present this here is that this 1,620 feet is practically the only unimproved portion of the main highway between Albany and Troy. The different municipalities have built a modern brick highway over the whole of that 6 miles, and this is the only disgraceful condition in the highway between those two great cities. The pavement will remain unimproved unless the Government is willing to meet its obligation and pay its share of the improvement of this highway, both sides of which it owns. The burden of the improvement will fall on the traction company. They will be required to pay about $12,000 for this improvement and the city will pay about $5,000. This amendment provides for the payment by the Government of its share as a property owner.

I would like to appeal for the improvement of this highway on the ground that the Government owes a duty to that community not to break the line of communication between the two cities, but I prefer to make the claim on the ground of the needs of the War Department. When I say that this roadway is in a dangerous condition, I mean it, because I have been over it time and time again during the last two or three years, and it is practically impasssable.

The matter has come to my attention also from conversations with the officers at the arsenal, who realize most the needs of the arsenal. It may be answered that the city should do it. They can not do it now or at any other time, in my judgment. The city is a small city of 15,000 people, already burdened with the improving of other portions of this highway where the Government does not own. The Government has used and is using miles of well-paved streets that have been improved, and the city will not and probably can not carry this extra burden all alone. The circumstances, it seems to me, show that the necessity is so great and the duty of the Government is so plain that this amendment should pass.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. NORTON. How far is this from the city?

Mr. SANFORD. The arsenal is in the city of Watervliet, and the highway runs through the arsenal grounds, and the arsenal is on both sides of the highway.

Mr. NORTON. Within the city limits?

Mr. SANFORD. It is within the limits of this small city of Watervliet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the committee, insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? Is there any item in this bill for roads in forts and military posts, and so forth? Where is any appropriation for taking care of the grounds at military posts?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The military roads would be in the Army bill, and not in this, Mr. Chairman. This road belongs to the city of Watervliet. It was acquired by condemnation proceedings from the turnpike company 24 years ago, and the Government has no title to the road whatever. It is owned entirely by the city of Watervliet. The question of whether the Government shall appropriate or expend money in improving public roads is not a recent one.

The Treasury Department has issued a circular under date of April 6, 1914, which I wish to put in the RECORD. It calls attention to the law and to the practice that has been followed by the Government. Before the Government acquires any land for any public purpose in any State there must be either special or general laws excepting the Government from liability of all taxes or assessments for public improvement, even though the improvements benefit the property of the Government. That is the situation in Watervliet, as it is in numerous other places in the State of New York. The United States Supreme Court has passed on this question. I know from the standpoint of Watervliet that this is an unfortunate situation, but if Congress initiates or wants to initiate the practice of contributing to the assessments to be levied on Government property because it is adjacent, it will be compelled to follow that policy in every community wherever there is a public building abutting on the street.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any item anywhere in this bill where there is an appropriation that can be used for a similar purpose to that proposed by the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; there is no appropriation in the bill that can be used to improve a road the title to which is not in the United States. The title to this road is in the city of Watervliet.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is correct in his statement. Take the arsenal at Indianapolis—an extensive one. When the sewers were put in the streets there was an effort to have the Government appropriate a portion of the money. My own town of Danville, when a public building was built, made an assessment against the United States, but no attention was paid to it, and the city council had to reimburse the contractor. So it was at the soldiers' home, where there was a road half a mile in extent, and which the city built by taxation, and half of it stood assessed against the Government for two or three years, and then the other half was improved at the expense of the city.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every year many applications are made to have the Government pay a part of these expenses. I think the soldiers' home in Milwaukee for a number of years has attempted to improve the road and lay a sidewalk about 900 feet long and have Congress pay a part of it, but Congress has refused to do it. The Congress refused to pave the streets around the post office in Chicago.

Mr. MADDEN. I know that; but does the gentleman remember that a few years since when the House, on motion of the gentleman from Brooklyn [Mr. CALDER], appropriated quite a large amount of money for paving and putting down the sidewalk at the Brooklyn Navy Yard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; the Government spent $10,000 putting down a sidewalk around the property of the Government, but that has always been done. Sidewalks around the public buildings, under the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, are authorized to be maintained at the expense of the Government. This was for a sidewalk; but for putting down paving in Flushing Avenue, Clinton Avenue, and Navy Street, around the navy yard—that is done by the city authority.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee what the policy of the Appropriations Committee has been, so far as sidewalks around the national reservations, such as the National Home for Volunteer Soldiers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee has not been very much inclined to spend money for that purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the purpose in Milwaukee, to improve the sidewalks around the National Soldiers' Home, and I hope the gentleman will not object when that amendment is offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a highway from Albany to Troy. The street car line occupies a part of the street. It was formerly a turnpike road. It is being improved by assessment of adjacent property owners. Now, if Congress would consent that the property of the Government should pay these local assessments and improve this stretch of road, it would initiate a policy that would compel us to acquiesce in local assessments for benefit whenever any local improvement is made. If that policy is ever initiated, it means an expenditure of millions of dollars annually for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it would mean if we adopted that policy now that from the foundation of the Government there would be just and equitable claims that Congress should reimburse cities for the expenditures that they have heretofore made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the circular to which I have referred, which gives the law and the decisions of the Supreme Court and what the policy of the Government has been.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The circular referred to is as follows:

ASSESSMENTS AGAINST UNITED STATES PROPERTY.

[Department Circular No. 24. 1914. Office Supervising Architect.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 6, 1914.

To custodians of Federal buildings and sites, municipal officers, and others who may be concerned:

PURPOSE.

(1) This department receives from time to time numerous notices of taxes or assessments against property of the United States under its control for such municipal improvements as sewers, sidewalks, street paving (roadway), gutters, curbing, street lighting, etc., and for sprinkling streets, removing snow and ice from sidewalks, caring for trees outside the United States lot, etc., for the payment of which assessments or charges no appropriation is made by Congress. The following information is published in an endeavor to forestall such notices and the resulting correspondence and occasional legal proceedings for the eventually necessary cancellation of such assessments, taxes, etc.

CONSENT—CESSION OF JURISDICTION—EXEMPTION.

(2) Article I, section 8, clause 17 of the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power * * * "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever * * * over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for * * * needful public buildings;" and section 355 of the Revised Statutes of the United States requires the cession of State jurisdiction over such sites before expenditures for Federal buildings can be made. In conformity with these provisions each of the several States has enacted general laws ceding to the United States jurisdiction over Federal building sites by virtue of which said sites are exempt from all taxation, assessment, or other charges levied or imposed by any State, county, or municipality. The principle of the nonliability of the Government for reimbursement for improvements made by States or municipalities inuring to the benefit of the Government is not a new one, but is sustained by a long and unbroken line of precedents and authorities, both national and State. (See 2 Comp. Dec., 375, and authorities therein cited.) Also see 4 Comptroller's Decisions, 116, wherein the statement is made:

"The United States are not liable for an assessment levied by local State authorities, even though the improvement may be a direct benefit to the property."

Doubtless for these reasons Congress has provided no appropriation for the payment by the Government of any part of the cost of municipal improvements. (McCullough v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316; Fagan v. Chicago, 84 Ill. Repts., 227; Coe v. Aaron, 116 U. S., 517; Van Brocklin v. Tennessee, 117 U. S., 151; People v. Austin, 47 Cal. Repts., 353; People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. Repts., 431; and United States v. Southern Oregon Co., 196 Fed. Rep., 423.)

POLICY OF CONGRESS.

(3) In former years numerous estimates for appropriations to reimburse cities for the cost of municipal improvements adjacent to Federal building sites were submitted to Congress by this department without favorable action being taken thereon, and the department has ceased to submit such estimates, it appearing to be the settled policy of Congress not to make appropriations therefor. The department can not, therefore, give favorable consideration to claims of municipalities on account of street improvements, etc.

CITY SEWERS—PRIVATE SEWERS.

(4) For the above-stated reasons this department can not join in the cost of the construction or repair of any public sewer, but does in certain cases construct private sewers at its expense, after having secured irrevocable licenses or easements (in the form of ordinances) giving the United States the right in perpetuity to the exclusive use of such sewer. Unless such permission to the United States be in perpetuity the appropriations under this department's control would not be available for the expenditure. Such sewers are in all cases designed to be only adequate for the necessities of the Federal building, and experience demonstrates that harassing complications frequently arise when permission is given for additional connections thereto. The department therefore uniformly refuses permission for private parties to connect with sewers owned and maintained by the Government for its exclusive use.

SIDEWALKS.

(5) Under a practice of long standing, now sanctioned by the accounting officers of the department, sidewalks and curbing are constructed about Federal buildings and kept in repair as part of the approaches to such buildings. This is the only character of expenditure in the nature of street improvements which the department is permitted to make. There is no authority, however, to construct sidewalks in connection with Federal building sites, but when the work on the Federal building is sufficiently advanced so that the sidewalks are not likely to be subject to injury from the building operations, they are laid to conform to municipal requirements. Where a municipality prefers to provide or repair sidewalks, curbing, etc., adjacent to a Federal building site, rather than to wait until the practical completion of the Federal building, the department interposes no objection to such action, but can not in any way reimburse the city for any expense incurred.

REMOVING SNOW AND ICE, CUTTING WEEDS, ETC.

(6) While it could not recognize any such assessment, etc., against the United States property for the cost of the removal of snow and ice from the abutting sidewalks or of overgrown weeds, grass, etc., from the site itself, the department does make provision for the accomplishment of these results. Generally a Federal building site not yet improved by the Government is in the custody of the vendor or other tenant, and the rental contract requires the tenant to keep the sidewalks clear of snow and ice and the grass and weeds cut. Where an unimproved site is in the actual possession of the Government's representative, or where the Federal building has been constructed, the custodian of the site or of the building is required to see that the removal of the snow and ice from the sidewalks and of weeds, grass, etc., from the site are attended to.

UNITED STATES PROPERTY OMITTED WHEN MAKING UP ASSESSMENTS.

(7) In view of the foregoing the department desires that this information be communicated to all municipalities in which Federal buildings are authorized or contemplated, and to such private parties as may be concerned; and those to whom this circular is sent are accordingly requested to apprise the proper municipal officials of the facts herein contained, in order that United States property may be omitted when making up taxes or assessments for any purpose whatsoever.

CANCELLATION OF ASSESSMENTS.

(8) A United States official who recives this circular in response to a notice of any assessment of the character referred to sent by him to this department is requested to apply to the proper municipal authorities for the cancellation of such assessment so far as the property of the United States is concerned, and to inform the department of the result of his application, in order that necessary steps for the cancellation of such assessment by legal proceedings may be taken should that course become necessary. While the assessments, taxes, etc., could not be collected from the United States the department is not willing to have assessments, etc., levied against the property under its control remain as an apparent cloud upon the title thereto, because this would doubtless reduce the selling price of the property should the department at some future date be authorized to dispose of it.

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, after line 6, insert the following: "For the improvement of roads within the arsenal grounds, $10,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order that that is a public road, so intended to be.

Mr. SANFORD. This is not a public road. It is a private road within the Government grounds. It belongs to the United States Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will read the statement of Gen. Crozier.

Mr. SANFORD. This is another road.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It says roads within the arsenal grounds. When Gen. Crozier was asked whether we owned that, he replied that we did not; that it belongs to the city of Watervliet.

Mr. SANFORD. That is a different road. I will make that clear to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But that road is within the arsenal grounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] will please state the road to which he refers.

Mr. SANFORD. It is in the Government grounds and is a Government road. It is a different road.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's amendment does not refer to that road. It refers to roads within the arsenal grounds, and the public road is within the arsenal grounds.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] will permit, the gentleman will notice that on page 63, line 12, there is an item for repairs to streets at the Springfield Arsenal of $7,100.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But those streets all belong to the United States Government; the title is in the Government; and no one can repair those streets except the United States Government.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] says that this is a similar case.

Mr. SANFORD. I think that we will save time if the gentleman will permit me to proceed. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. In the estimates of the War Department Gen. Crozier presented two items, one for $10,000 for the improvement of Government roads within the Government arsenal and the other an item for $10,000, which has just gone out in my amendment on a point of order. The one $10,000 item was for Broadway and the other $10,000 item was the private roads within the arsenal grounds. Gen. Crozier had this to say, and it seems to me that I can add no argument to what he says:

The CHAIRMAN. For road repairs, $20,000.

Gen. CROZIER. That estimate in its application is divided into two parts. Ten thousand dollars of this amount will be used for repairing the main roads of the arsenal which are in bad condition, resulting from the fact that they were built originally for much lighter traffic than takes place over them now. The broken stone which has been added on this road from time to time has broken through and heavy wheels go clear down to the foundation. The roads have been badly rutted and are no longer in proper condition. It is the same experience everybody has with increased traffic and increased heavy traffic, and we will have to put in better roads.

This is the one item with reference to roads inside the Watervliet Arsenal. I was interested to look at the items in the bill for other arsenals. At Frankford there is an item of $11,600, and in the evidence I find no proof with reference to it. At Rock Island, $13,000; and in the evidence I find no reference to it. At Sandy Hook, $3,000; at Springfield, Mass., $7,100. The streets in Springfield are owned by the Government, as Gen. Crozier showed, and they would like to get rid of them. With reference to the Watervliet Arsenal, which happens to be in the district which I have the honor to represent, we have the strongest evidence of the War Department that there is pressing and immediate need for the improvement of the roads, for the reason that they have broken down under the heavy traffic. I feel that I have a right, therefore, to press upon the attention of this committee a consideration of this particular claim. That arsenal is now building the heaviest guns, according to my information, that are constructed in the United States. It is not good business to have those roads in the condition in which they are. The commanding officer of the arsenal reported in his testimony to Gen. Crozier that the expense of repairing those roads now from time to time is so great that the Government would save money by appropriating $10,000 and reconstructing the roads. It seems to me the amendment is not only not subject to the point of order, but it is not subject to serious criticism, and I respectfully ask for the consideration of the item.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MONDELL. I want to be heard upon the merits of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first pass upon the point of order. The Chair understands that this road belongs to the Government of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some of them do and some of them do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] has stated and nobody has denied it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I deny it. I say that some of the roads within the arsenal grounds belong to the Government and some belong to the city of Watervliet, and the language includes both roads.

Mr. SANFORD. I ask unanimous consent to amend my amendment by inserting the words "Government-owned."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his amendment and offers another, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by making it read as follows: "For the improvement of Government-owned roads within the arsenal grounds, $10,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague was unfortunate in calling attention to what he said were items in this bill for other arsenals, upon which he could find no evidence in the hearings. The estimate for the Watervliet Arsenal submitted by the War Department aggregated $389,900. This bill carries $803,700, or a little more than double the amount estimated. It carries this additional sum because the Committee on Appropriations, after careful inquiry, determined to make certain improvements in that arsenal which would better equip it for the work required. The War Department asked about $295,000 to equip the arsenal for the manufacture of 16-inch guns. There is no plant in the United States to-day, Government or private, which is equipped to manufacture 16-inch guns. The projects of the War Department requiring 16-inch guns in our coast defense necessitate the manufacture of 26 such guns, and at the rate they could be turned out, with the estimate submitted by the War Department, it would take nine years to build them. The committee has provided sufficient funds to enable these guns to be made in four years, so that the committee has not been niggardly in treating this arsenal but has been very liberal. Now, the bill carries an item, immediately following the place at which the gentleman from New York has offered this amendment, for the repairs of arsenals. The appropriation for the current year is $290,000, and this bill carries $300,000. If the repairs of those roads which the Government owns are of an imperative character, this appropriation is available for that purpose, and it is to put on the department the responsibility of expending this money for repairs, those repairs most essential, that the committee gives this lump appropriation instead of attempting to determine each particular repair item at all the various arsenals. That can not well be done. There are ample funds to repair these roads if the repairs be essential. This arsenal has been treated with great liberality. It seems to me the department should make the repairs if desirable or necessary from the appropriation that is provided for that purpose. For that reason I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed just for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I want to make it very clear to the chairman of the committee that in my remarks in reference to this amendment I do not for a moment wish to complain that Watervliet Arsenal has not been well treated. I do not think you can treat the Watervliet Arsenal in my district well or ill. That arsenal is yours and it is the Government's, and I do not feel that I am presenting here any local or special claim.

I am very grateful to the committee for the kind and thorough consideration they gave to the item I first proposed. I am sorry, too, that they felt constrained to make the point of order. I do not want to complain of anything that they have done for the arsenal. I think the money they have invested and the money they are about to invest there is wisely invested, and I do not take the point of view the chairman seems to assume. I am not complaining one way or another with reference to the treatment they give to that arsenal. I do feel, however, that there is distinct merit in this particular item, as shown by all the uncontradicted evidence before the committee, and I can see no reason why the item for this district should not be treated the same as the items for other districts. I can see no reason why this arsenal should be left to the lump sum at the end of the bill in the manner suggested instead of being given the same consideration the other claims have been given in this bill by items.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. SANFORD) there were—ayes 28, noes 30.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is too late, but the Chair will indulge the gentleman.

Mr. SANFORD. I was on my feet as soon as I could do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the point of order of no quorum is made now and sustained, would that vacate all these proceedings?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. MANN. Well, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-one gentlemen are present——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 15836 and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. EDWIN C. BURLEIGH, late a Senator from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

SCHOONER LEDGE RANGE FRONT LIGHT STATION.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 5244.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5244) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to exchange the land now occupied by the Schooner Ledge Range Front Light Station at the mouth of Crum Creek, Pa., for other lands adjacent thereto which are intersected by the axis of the Chester Range Line of the Delaware River, and authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to remove said Schooner Ledge Range Front Light Station after certain conditions have been complied with.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to pass Senate bill 5244, just reported.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bill has not been reported. It has to be read before it can be passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has read the title, and he will read the rest of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey to Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain all that certain lot or piece or parcel of land granted and conveyed to the United States of America by the president and company of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. by deed dated December 29, 1879, situated in Tinicum Township, in the county of Delaware and State of Pennsylvania, described according to a recent survey as follows: Beginning at a point in the south side of the entrance gate to the basin (for the storage of canal boats in winter) on the upper side of the mouth of Crum Creek and running thence along the cross bank dividing said basin from the meadow at the mouth of Crum Creek south 4° west 157 feet; thence south 13° 55′ east 100 feet; thence south 20° east 319 feet, more or less, to low-water line in the Delaware River; thence by the low-water line of the Delaware River and Crum Creek to the place of beginning, containing 5 acres, more or less, being part of a certain larger tract or parcel of land which the "president, managers, and company of the Schuylkill Navigation Co.," by a certain indenture dated the 12th day of July, A. D. 1870, recorded, etc., granted, and conveyed unto the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., their successors and assigns, together with the free and uninterrupted use, right, liberty, and privilege of passage in and along a certain roadway 16 feet wide next to the line of Crum Creek and upon the bank extending along and following the course of the said creek from the railroad of the Philadelphia & Wilmington Railroad Co. to the herein-described premises as now in use; for and in consideration of the said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain granting and conveying to the United States in fee simple the following-described premises and rights of way situated on Crum Creek, after its course shall have been changed, in the county of Delaware, State of Pennsylvania, now belonging to them, to wit: A certain piece or parcel of land whose boundaries shall form a parallelogram containing 1 acre, more or less, with 200 feet frontage on the east side of the new course of Crum Creek, Pa., which frontage shall be intersected by the axis or center line of Chester Range, at a point to be approved by the Secretary of Commerce, together with the full and uninterrupted use, right, liberty, and privilege of passage for persons and vehicles over an accessible, direct, and improved right of way 16 feet wide, wholly above high-water mark, from the premises above described to the right of way of the Chester branch of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., the said right of way to be used in common and wholly maintained by the said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and kept in passable condition at all times; also a suitable and sufficient right of way for beams of light on the Chester Range Line over all the property on said range line between the proposed permanent front and rear lights of Chester Range, and to the southward and westward of said front light: Provided, That the Attorney General shall first examine the title of said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain to premises to be conveyed to the United States as aforesaid and shall furnish his written opinion in favor of the validity thereof: Provided further, That the said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain, within such reasonable time after the passage of this act as may be determined by the Secretary of Commerce, shall deed to the United States the premises herein described to be conveyed by them: And provided further, That the conveyance of the herein-described lot or parcel of land now owned by the United States of America shall not be made and the title thereto shall not pass to the said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain until the following shall have been done by said persons without expense to the United States and to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce: First, erect a bulkhead of permanent construction on the easterly side of the new course of Crum Creek along the entire frontage of the premises to be conveyed to the United States of America, which shall consist of a timber pile foundation supporting a timber platform and a gravity section concrete retaining wall of the same construction as approved by the United States Engineer office and now being erected on the southwest side of the mouth of Crum Creek; second, fill the entire plot of land to be conveyed to the United States with sand, earth, or other suitable material to an elevation of 12 feet above mean low water; third, dredge a channel from the premises to be conveyed to the United States to the main channel of the Delaware River having a depth of not less than 6 feet at mean low water; fourth, construct and make available for the purposes of the United States the improved right of way for the passage of persons and vehicles provided for herein: And provided further, That the conveyance shall not be made by the United States and title shall not pass from the United States until the permanent tower and dwelling proposed to be built by it on the land to be conveyed to it shall be ready for occupancy, nor until all valuable lighthouse property is removed by the United States from the site to be conveyed by it: And provided further, That the existing lights now in use shall continue, without interference by said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain, until the establishment by the United States of permanent lights on Chester Range.

SEC. 2. That the said Alba B. Johnson and Samuel M. Vauclain, upon the passage of this act, and after the rendition by the Attorney General of his opinion in favor of the validity of the title to be conveyed to the United States and the conveyance to the United States of such title, shall have the right to proceed with improvements upon the tract to be conveyed by the United States, except upon such portions as are actually required for lighthouse purposes, under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce.

SEC. 3. That all expenses incurred by the United States in making the exchange of property herein authorized, including the cost of such abstracts, official certifications, and evidences of title as the Attorney General may deem necessary, and all expenses incurred in removing such lighthouse property on the present site as may be advantageous to the interests of the Government shall be payable from the appropriation "General expenses, Lighthouse Service," for the fiscal years in which such expenses are incurred.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution and would ask for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

House resolution 264.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 13233) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to exchange lands belonging to the United States at the mouth of Crum River, Pa., for other lands adjacent thereto, for the purpose of removing thereto the Schooner Ledge Range Front Light, so that it may be on the range of the channel of the Delaware River, and further authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to remove said range light from its present location to the property acquired by the exchange.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on next Wednesday—Calendar Wednesday—may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business in order on next Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object to any good thing, but lots of us are here waiting for Calendar Wednesday in order to pass some bills, and I will have to ask our distinguished leader to make some other provision to get them considered.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think there will be no trouble about that later.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The Army bill is to be taken up Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Army bill we expect to be taken up on Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Ruler of all the peoples of the earth, Thou hast made of one blood all the nations that dwell on the face of the earth. Thou hast fixed their habitation. Thou hast said thus far shalt thou go and no farther. Thou dost stand guard over the rights of men by eternal law. Justice and judgment are the habitation of Thy throne. We bless Thee for the path through which Thou hast led us as a people and for the achievements Thou hast granted to us as a Nation. Thou dost call us in our day to an ever-widening circle of influence. We pray that we may touch all people with the refining and uplifting power of the great ideals that have been our peculiar inheritance as a Nation. If Thou dost thrust us into the conflict of the world, may we go still as messengers of justice and judgment and honor and love among all men. Preserve us from every evil thing, and may the motives and purposes of this Nation stand the test of the judgment of God. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

COLLECTION OF DISCRIMINATING DUTIES (S. DOC. NO. 470).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting in response to a resolution of March 16, 1916, a statement relative to discriminating duties on imports or discriminating tonnage duties on foreign vessels, etc., which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WALSH presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Hardin, Mont., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Great Falls, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit interstate transmission of race gambling odds and bets, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MYERS. I present resolutions adopted by the women voters of Havre, Mont., in favor of the Susan B. Anthony suffrage amendment, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION PASSED BY WOMEN VOTERS OF HAVRE, MONT.

Resolved, That we, the women voters of Havre, assembled in conference at Havre, June 13, 1916, urge that the national administration give facilities for the passing of the Susan B. Anthony amendment during the present session of Congress; and further be it

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the administration leaders in our National Capital and the Members of the Montana congressional delegation Unanimously adopted.

Mrs. FRANK BOSSOUT,	Mrs. RAYMOND HULFISH,
Mrs. EDWARD BIMROSE,	Miss LAURA GRACE LOVETT,
Miss LULU CHESTNUT,	Mrs. E. E. BENRY,
Mrs. C. B. WILSON,	Mrs. A. CROSSON,

Congressional Union Executive Committee, Havre, Mont.

Mr. MYERS. I present a petition of Grain Belt Grange, of Hill County, Mont., in favor of opening certain lands in Montana for settlement, and I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Hon. H. L. MYERS,
United States Senator.

DEAR SIR: There is a bill before the United States Senate at this time—S. 5772, Calendar No. 425—providing for the sinking of artesian wells, and for other purposes, in northern Montana. You are, no doubt, well acquainted with conditions of this section of the country and know that settlement has been deterred in many cases on account of the uncertainty of the distance for water. This organization respectfully asks you to use your personal efforts in assisting this bill in its passage, believing that it will be the source of great benefit to the settlers and farmers of the entire northern part of the State of Montana.

C. F. WARREN, Master.
W. F. MCDONALD, Secretary.

Mr. MYERS. I present a petition of Grain Belt Grange, of Hill County, Mont., in favor of the sinking of artesian wells, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. H. L. MYERS,
United States Senate:

Referring to Senate bill No. 3646, which passed the Senate some time ago and has been reported by the committee to the House, this organization wishes to solicit your best efforts in securing the retention of section 12 of that bill intact. Inasmuch as Beaver Creek is the last fishing stream on Government land in all of the section of northern Montana and because of absence of any such stream of so great area, it would be a great boon to the citizens of parts of Chouteau, Toole, Hill, Blaine, and Phillips Counties to have this place set aside, as designated in the bill referred to, as a playground for these people. It is a well-known fact that practically none of the land embraced in the boundaries of this park is tillable, and that no intending settler would be injured by its dedication; and in view of these facts, we, the members of Grain Belt Grange, do respectfully solicit your best efforts in securing the passage of this bill through the lower House as it passed the Senate.

C. F. WARREN, Master.
W. F. MCDONALD, Secretary.

He also presented a petition of the Sons of Veterans of New Haven, Conn., praying for an increase in armaments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of George M. Cole Camp, No. 7, United Spanish War Veterans, of New London, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to widows and orphans of veterans of the Spanish-American War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a resolution in the form of a petition from the officers and members of the Kansas State Association of Letter Carriers, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by Kansas Letter Carriers' Convention at Ottawa, Kans., May 30, 1916.

Resolved, That the officers and members of the Kansas State Association of the National Association of Letter Carriers, in convention assembled, do unanimously indorse the following bills now pending in Congress: The Tinkham bill, to place postmasters under the civil service; the Nolan bill, making $3 per day the minimum wage for any Government employee; and the Keating bill, giving civil-service employees the right of appeal to some disinterested court: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of the Senators and Representatives of Kansas, and to the Postal Record for publication.

Mr. BRADY. I present a memorial signed by citizens in the vicinity of Athol, Idaho, remonstrating against an increase in armaments, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I present resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 13. By Mr. Leon R. Smith.

Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a bill introduced by Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD, which has for its object and purpose the nullification of the law as declared in the now famous Shreveport rate case; and

Whereas the General Assembly of Louisiana by resolution and appropriations made for the purpose had the suit brought that wiped away the rate barrier erected by the State of Texas against Louisiana commerce at the State line; and

Whereas the future prosperity of a large part of the population of Louisiana, together with the welfare of the cities of New Orleans, Shreveport, Monroe, and Alexandria are indissolubly linked with the matter of freight rates; and

Whereas if the Sheppard bill, now pending in the United States Congress, should be enacted into law the effect of the rate fight already won would be nullified: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the General Assembly of Louisiana earnestly urge its United States Senators and Representatives in Congress to vigorously oppose the passage of Senate bill 5242, introduced by Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD and now pending before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and that copies of this resolution be forthwith forwarded to Louisiana's Senators and Congressmen upon the passage of this resolution.

ETHELRED M. STAFFORD,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
HEWITT BONANCHAUD,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

O. H. SIMPSON,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I present a letter and resolutions from the board of directors of the Board of Trade (Ltd.) of New Orleans, La., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.), in regular session on June 14, 1916.

Whereas the New Orleans Board of Trade is earnestly desirous of such action by the Federal Government as will assist in building up an American merchant marine; and

Whereas we are absolutely convinced that any method whereby Government-owned ships will be operated either directly by the Government or under private charter, as merchant carriers, will be an added and powerful factor in preventing the investment of the private capital in American merchant shipping: Be it

Resolved, That the New Orleans Board of Trade (Ltd.) is strongly opposed to the provisions of what is known as the Alexander bill, H. R. 15455, now before the Senate, and earnestly urges unfavorable action thereon; be it further

Resolved, That this board of trade again petitions Congress for the immediate appointment of a special board of expert commercial men instructed to thoroughly investigate all present conditions affecting our American shipping, and to devise methods whereby existing disabilities may be removed and the development of an American merchant marine may be assured.

THE NEW ORLEANS BOARD OF TRADE (LTD.),
New Orleans, June 1½, 1916.

Senator ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I inclose you copy of resolutions passed by the board of trade directors at a meeting held June 14. We do not like to appear as eternally protesting against shipping legislation, such as has been considered by Congress during the past two or three years, but, as you know, the board of trade is distinctly in earnest in its desire for material and prompt development of the American merchant marine.

It seems a great pity that Congress in this shipping legislation will persist in considering so important a matter while lacking absolutely essential data. I do not believe Congress would for a moment consider appropriating $50,000,000 for the improvement of a harbor or a number of rivers until a board or boards of survey had carefully considered and reported. Yet this legislation, more far-reaching in its effects for good or evil than the improvement of any single harbor, calling for a prime expenditure of $50,000,000, with possible further responsibilities, is and has been considered by Congress with no expert investigation whatever.

Surely the common-sense method to handle this matter is to have Congress appoint a strong board of capable business men with expert knowledge of shipping, instruct them to investigate any possible handicaps under which American shipping is laboring, and to make practical suggestions whereby the Government of the United States may, if it is necessary, assist in the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine. Government ownership most certainly will not assist but probably would kill any real development of our shipping, and the administration, in my humble opinion, will lose many votes if it pushes the Alexander bill through Congress.

There is also in the Alexander bill a matter in which we locally and you personally have, in my opinion, a very decided interest, and that is the proposal to place not only foreign water-borne commerce but all interstate water-borne commerce under the control of this proposed shipping board.

Only quite recently the board of trade appointed a special committee on river-traffic development, and this committee is finding out how extremely difficult it is to interest private capital in such an enterprise. If this development is to be choked at the start by the rules and regulations of a shipping board, possibly something like those of the Interstate Commerce Commission, even if the capital were subscribed, which is most unlikely, and such budding attempt to develop traffic on our rivers would promptly be overcome by rate regulations, which would prevent that freedom in rate and traffic operations essential to any new enterprise of this nature.

As one who has been a persistent advocate of improvements to our waterways, we beg of you to strenuously oppose any measures to choke off the development of river traffic by restrictions such as are inevitable under the proposed shipping board. Only by the utmost freedom in handling competitive conditions forced upon them by the railroads, and other disabilities, can any water commerce ever obtain a footing.

Please excuse this long letter, but I am feeling strongly in the matter, especially the possible effect on our inland waterways, and we all here earnestly hope for your powerful assistance.

Yours, very truly,

M. J. SANDERS, President.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I present a report of the special merchant-marine committee of the New Orleans Association of Commerce, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE,
June 10, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senator,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: For your information I inclose herewith report of the special merchant-marine committee of the Association of Commerce, ratified by the board of directors of this organization at a meeting held Friday, June 9, 1916.

Very truly, yours,

WALTER LORNEY,
General Manager.

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL MERCHANT-MARINE COMMITTEE OF THE NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

(Approved by board of directors June 9, 1916.)

BOARD OF DIRECTORS, NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

GENTLEMEN: Your special merchant-marine committee begs to report as follows:

We have considered H. R. 15455, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, a measure known as the Alexander bill, "to establish a United States shipping board," etc.

It is our opinion that the Association of Commerce, through its board of directors, should go on record as reaffirming its position on this bill in line with its vote on referendum No. 9 of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

The vote of the Association of Commerce on this referendum was as follows:

BALLOT NO. 1.

(1) The Association of Commerce voted as being opposed to the Government undertaking the purchase, construction, or charter of vessels for mercantile purposes, together with the operation of such vessels.

(2) Opposed to ownership of merchant vessels by the Government, but with operation by private parties under leases.

(3) In favor of subsidies from the Government sufficient to offset the differences in cost between operation of vessels under the American flag and operation in the same deep-sea trades under foreign flags, provided that the navigation laws of the United States can not be changed or some other way be found to accomplish the same purpose.

(4) In favor of subventions from the Government to establish regular mail and freight lines under the American flag to countries in which the commercial interests of the United States are important and to American dependencies.

(1) In favor of recommendation for the creation of a Federal shipping board to investigate and report to Congress regarding the navigation laws, and to have full jurisdiction under the law in all matters pertaining to over-sea transportation.

(2) Opposed to recommendation that the Government subscribe to the entire stock of a marine development company, with a capital of $30,000,000, this company to have authority for seven years to lend, under supervision of the Federal shipping board, upon the security of first mortgages on merchant vessels, taking as evidence of this indebtedness bonds which bear a fair rate of interest and contain provisions for amortization, the development company to guarantee the bonds as to principal and interest and to sell them to the public.

(3) In favor of recommendation that the ocean-mail law of 1891 be amended by lowering the speed for first-class steamers from 20 to 16 knots and for second-class steamers from 16 to 12 knots, and by making the compensation adequate to permit the establishment of lines of steamships carrying both mail and freight.

(4) In favor of recommendation that there should be legislation abolishing deferred rebates and providing for supervision of rates by the Federal shipping board, with requirements for filing with the board schedules of rates and all agreements among over-sea lines.

(5) In favor of recommendation that Federal licenses should be taken out by lines, domestic and foreign, engaged in shipping between ports of the United States and other countries.

It is further recommended that the Association of Commerce again advise the Louisiana Senators and Representatives in Washington of its position on this legislation, expressing the opinion that legislation along the lines of its vote on the provisions of the above referendum would be proper and timely and effective, rather than such legislation as is proposed by H. R. 15455.

Respectfully submitted.

SPECIAL MERCHANT-MARINE COMMITTEE,
NEW ORLEANS ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I present a letter from the general manager of the New Orleans Joint Traffic Bureau, addressed to me, together with a copy of a letter addressed to my colleague, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the letters were referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS JOINT TRAFFIC BUREAU,
New Orleans, La., June 15, 1916.

Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BROUSSARD: I have written Judge RANSDELL as per copy of letter attached, addressing him as I have because of his intimate connection with the Rivers and Harbors Congress and with efforts to revive interstate water navigation.

There may be many good things in this measure. There are some mighty bad ones, and there is nothing more calculated to do harm to New Orleans and to Louisiana, with its nearly 5,000 miles of navigable water, than a regulatory scheme of this character.

There is no need of it, and if it comes it will for a long time discourage, in our judgment, the restoration of river navigation or of coastwise navigation or of intercoastal navigation.

We are anxious to have an opportunity to present certain views to the committee before these provisions of the bill are finally passed upon.

We believe the experience of this town is such as to cause the committee to pause before adopting any such broad scheme of regulation as this.

Yours, very sincerely,

THEODORE BRENT,
General Manager.

JUNE 15, 1916.

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE RANSDELL: I don't know whether or not you have been giving very close attention to H. R. 15455, the shipping bill, but I assume you have, as it is one of the President's pet measures and you are close to him.

Since the consideration of the original bill presented in the House, regulatory features have been added to this bill, which make it so inimical to the interests of every water community that I trust you will give careful consideration to these provisions.

The sections of this bill, from section 17 on, particularly those which have to do with the regulation of interstate carriers by water, are, to the minds of our people here, thoroughly unworkable, and are the very thing we don't want if we ever hope to revive water commerce on our rivers.

The idea of requiring a steamboat to file all of its rates, and to permit no changes in these rates, either up or down, except after approval by the shipping board, would make the very situation which is best calculated to both remove the incentive for investment in water craft and the incentive on the part of the communities for their use.

Perhaps there is need of some regulation of competing rail carriers from cutting down rates for the mere purpose of eliminating water competition, but to regulate the water carrier itself, so as to make that water carrier's rates inflexible, creates a situation which has never been found to work in connection with shipping on the navigable streams or the open seas and lakes.

There are very reasonable and sane things to be said in opposition to all of this provision for regulation of interstate water carriers, and before this bill is passed, and I understand it is being pressed to a final hearing in committee, for the very sake of the river interests with which you are so intimately connected, we desire an opportunity to express more clearly than we can in a letter of this character views opposed to the adoption of these measures.

I understand the matter is before the Senate Committee on Commerce and that the committee is trying to get it in such shape as to report it back to the Senate not later than the twenty-second.

We crave an opportunity to speak and, if desirable, present a brief in opposition to the regulatory features of this bill, which seem to have been an afterthought, and we feel confident that unless they are eliminated the interests now most desiring water navigation will have very little further interest in the proposition.

Yours, very sincerely, THEODORE BRENT,
General Manager.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALSH (for Mr. JOHNSON of Maine), from the Committee on Pensions, submitted a report (No. 521) accompanied by a bill (S. 6369) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which was read twice by its title, the bill being a substitute for the following Senate bills heretofore referred to that committee:

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Industrial Expositions, to which was referred the bill (S. 3444) to provide for a permanent exhibit of the resources of the States of the Union in or near Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 523) thereon.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2536) for the relief of Joseph A. Buckholdt, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 524) thereon.

Mr. BROUSSARD, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 2292) to acquire the manuscript of Charles Chaillé-Long, containing an account of the unveiling of the McClellan Statue, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 525) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably with amendment the bill (H. R. 13383) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and I submit a report (No. 520) thereon. I desire to give notice that at the close of the morning business I shall ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5992) authorizing the cutting of timber for mining purposes by corporations organized in one State and conducting mining operations in another, reported it without amendment.

MEMORIAL TO FRANCIS ASBURY.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 136) authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Francis Asbury, and I ask for its present consideration. The joint resolution does not involve an appropriation, but merely authorizes the erection of a statue in this city to Bishop Asbury, the celebrated Methodist bishop.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the joint resolution be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant permission to the Francis Asbury Memorial Association for the erection on public grounds of the United States in the city of Washington, D. C., other than those of the Capitol, the Library of Congress, and the White House, of a memorial to Francis Asbury, a pioneer preacher and bishop, whose itinerant labors from 1771 to 1816 in the interest of religion, morality, education, and patriotism were a distinct aid to the Republic: Provided, That the site chosen and the design of the memorial shall be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts, and that the United States shall be put to no expense in or by the erection of the said memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF MONUMENT AT PUEBLO, COLO.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I ask for a change of reference of the bill providing for the acceptance of a monument located on the grounds of the Federal building in Pueblo, Colo., from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on the Library.

There being no objection, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 6351), authorizing the acceptance by the United States Government from Pueblo Post No. 8, Grand Army of the Republic, of a monument located on the grounds of the Federal building in Pueblo, Colo., and the bill was referred to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 144) waiving claim on the part of the United States and consenting to the closing and abandoning certain public streets and parts of public streets in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, within a site selected for the uses and purposes of the San Francisco State Normal School, and authorizing the Attorney General to appear on behalf of the United States in any condemnation suit which may be brought by the State of California in the courts of that State to acquire the property selected for such site; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the investigation and improvement of tobacco and methods of tobacco production and handling from $27,500 to $42,500, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigations of plant diseases and pathological collections so as to include tobacco diseases from $38,500 to $43,500, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. OLIVER (for Mr. PENROSE) submitted an amendment providing that the pay clerks, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, now on the retired list shall hereafter have the rank, pay, and allowances of a second lieutenant, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 16460), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment proposing that the United States give consent to the closing and abandoning of such public streets or parts of public streets in the city and county of San Francisco lying north of Tonquin Street and east of the eastern boundary of the Presidio, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 16460), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHILTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $7,500 to grade and improve Belmont Street from Sixteenth to Seventeenth Streets NW., in the city of Washington, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 15774), which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BURLEIGH.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 215), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator EDWIN C. BURLEIGH, from the State of Maine, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

CREEK INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. PAGE. On the 13th of June I entered a motion that the vote by which Senate joint resolution 114 was passed be reconsidered. I did so by request, and I now withdraw the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider is withdrawn and, without objection, the joint resolution will be returned to the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS (S. DOC. NO. 466).

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document an address delivered by the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. John Skelton Williams, before the annual convention of the Tennessee Bankers' Association at Chattanooga, Tenn., May 19, 1916.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the request?

Mr. FLETCHER. The request is to print as a public document an address delivered at Chattanooga, Tenn., by Hon. John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSTRUCTION OF BATTLESHIPS (S. DOC. NO. 465).

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, four years ago I introduced a resolution in the Senate in regard to the matter discussed by Commander Moffett in the article I send to the desk. The resolution was treated as a joke and everybody laughed at it and at me, too.

The rapid growth in the size of battleships shows that I was not so far ahead of the times as some people thought, and Commander Moffett's article will give the reasons and explain the growth of war vessels since the Spanish-American War. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution above mentioned and the communication from Commander Moffett may be published in the RECORD, including the illustrations, which show at a glance just what he means. The question of the naval building program is now before the Congress and must be acted on soon. I shall ask for either two battleships of the Pennsylvania type or some better type to be built or for one of the type mentioned in Commander Moffett's article. I think it but fair I should say this, and I want Senators to get all the light possible in order that they may vote intelligently when the time comes. I ask that this matter be printed in the usual RECORD type, so that people can read it.

Mr. SMOOT. There are illustrations?

Mr. TILLMAN. There are illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presumes it will be necessary to have it referred to the Committee on Printing to determine about the illustrations.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it ought to go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

Mr. FLETCHER subsequently, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution (S. Res. 216), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on June 20, 1916, entitled "Construction of Battleships," be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION (S. DOC. NO. 468).

Mr. JONES. I have a copy of an address delivered by Henry J. Pierce, of Seattle, Wash., before the National Electric Light Association at Chicago, May 24, 1916, with reference to the water-power proposition, and especially taking up in detail and comparing the different bills now pending. I ask that it may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES H. KINNANE.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have a copy of an address delivered by Hon. James H. Kinnane, State senator of Michigan, bearing on the question of preparedness, which I should like to have referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That action will be taken.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR JAMES.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask that an address delivered by Senator JAMES before the national convention at St. Louis be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I have had a number of Senators speak to me in relation to the printing of the proceedings of both the Republican and the Democratic national conventions. Most of them have expressed the opinion that we should not enter into the printing of the speeches made or the proceedings at the convention. I myself believe that it would be very much better not to do so.

I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not have this matter referred to the Committee on Printing so that whatever course is decided upon may be followed?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have not asked to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. But as a public document.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is the speech of a colleague of ours and it is different from that of an ordinary man outside. A speech like this I think ought to be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not object for a moment if it were not for the fact that I expect a great many applications will be made for printing the proceedings of the conventions, and I believe there ought to be a policy adopted in relation to it. It will make no difference, I will say to the Senator, to have the speech of the Senator from Kentucky considered by the committee and I ask that the Senator allow it to go to the committee.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is objection, of course it will have to go there.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have it referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have an editorial from the Washington Post of this morning relative to the business condition of the country. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, June 20, 1916.]

UNPRECEDENTED BUSINESS ACTIVITY THROUGHOUT THE REPUBLIC.

There exist unprecedented activities in the industrial districts of the United States, and in many of the most important branches of manufacturing orders unfilled are constantly increasing, even with full capacity of output being maintained.

When the phrase or term "full capacity of output" is used it should be remembered that capacities of many industrial plants have been largely increased during the past 18 months, and that now "full capacity" means vastly greater volumes and values than were possible in 1912, 1913, or 1914.

In very few lines of manufactured goods are there any surplus or reserve stocks, and this statement applies to homemade as well as imported articles, and from the ultimate distributer, whether a small shopkeeper or an extensive mercantile establishment, to the mill, the shop, or factory of origin, it is a hand-to-hand business now, with all the agencies dependent and waiting upon the manufacturers for delivery of the needed articles.

Whether the articles desired be metals, woods, stone, brick, or fibers, it is wait, wait all along the line from manufacturer to ultimate consumer; and this condition of commodities being sold far ahead has not been equaled in the United States since the days of the Civil War, more than a half century ago.

The entire country is aware of the "sold-ahead" condition in the iron and steel trades, in the copper, zinc, and lead markets, in nearly every class of machinery output, in the locomotive works, the car factories, the automobile and motor-truck manufactories. Lack of sufficient numbers of skilled operatives in the cotton and woolen mills is causing the piling up of orders in these industries, and this is true of the silk mills as well.

Several of the largest carpet and rug dealers have recalled their salesmen from the road, as the mills turning out carpets and rugs have their outputs sold ahead as far as they care to go at this time.

The new wheat from Texas and Oklahoma has commenced to roll over the railway tracks of the Southwest, bound for the markets of this country and those of the world, and from now on to next September the urgency of freight for transportation will tax the facilities of the transportation lines throughout the Union.

Active business, larger business, profitable business is booked for the business men of the United States during every succeeding month of the next fiscal year.

THE STEEL INDUSTRY (S. DOC. NO. 469).

Mr. WORKS. I have here a very interesting letter from the managing editor of the Implement and Tractor Trade Journal, of Kansas City, and an article published in that journal bearing upon the effect of our trade with foreign nations in arms and munitions of war upon our domestic manufacturers of farm implements and other machinery. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WORKS subsequently said: On a suggestion I will change my request and ask to have the matter printed as a public document instead of it being printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NAVAL MANAGEMENT AND DISCIPLINE.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to announce on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] that his address scheduled for yesterday will be delivered to-morrow, Wednesday.

REPORT ON FLOOD CONDITIONS (S. DOC. NO. 467).

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document a report on flood conditions in the Lake of the Woods and Rainey Lake districts, Minnesota and Ontario, submitted by Charles A. MaGrath and James A. Tawney, members of the International Joint Commission. It is a very brief report, and I desire to have it printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMERICANISM AND PREPAREDNESS.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on next Monday I shall address the Senate very briefly on the subject of Americanism and preparedness.

TOWN SITE OF PLUMMER, IDAHO.

H. R. 14725. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to subdivide a part of the town site of Plummer, Idaho, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the bill just read by the Secretary was introduced in the House by Representative MCCRACKEN, of Idaho, and is identical in every way with Senate bill No. 3618, introduced by me on January 18, and which is now pending in the House of Representatives. At the last session the Senate passed a similar bill, but it failed of passage in the House. The passage of this bill means much to the citizens of Plummer, Idaho. Plummer is a splendid little city, with good schools, churches, and a high class of citizens, and the fact that this land can not be subdivided retards the growth and progress of this city, and the passage of this bill will be beneficial not only to the citizens of that community but to the Government as well, for the Government retains a certain percentage of the amount for which the lots are to be sold, and as this bill has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. BRADY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "and," I move to strike out "twenty-seven" and insert "thirty-seven."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "and," it is proposed to strike out "twenty-seven" and to insert "thirty-seven," so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be subdivided that part of the town site of Plummer, Cœur d'Alene Reservation, Idaho (which town site was created under the act of June 21, 1906; 34 Stats. L., pp. 325, 337), described as the southeast quarter of section 18, township 46 north, range 4 west, into streets or roads and into tracts of not exceeding 5 acres each, and to cause the tracts to be appraised, except such as are hereinafter reserved for the town of Plummer, and sold at not less than their appraised value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

FLORIDA NATIONAL FOREST.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3764) to consolidate certain forest lands in the Florida National Forest; which was, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "Department" and to insert "Secretary."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there was so much confusion in the Chamber that I really could not catch what the amendment was, and I will ask the Senator from Florida to explain it.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill, as it passed the Senate, provided that certain matters therein referred to should be attended to by the Department of Agriculture. The bill was amended in the other House to read that they should be attended to by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. SMOOT. That is proper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the House of Representatives is concurred in.

GEORGE H. HERVEY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3344) to authorize George H. Hervey, of Pensacola, Fla., to construct and operate an electric railway line on the Fort Barrancas and Fort McRee Military Reservations, Fla., and for other purposes, which was, in lines 1 and 2, to strike out "That the consent of the United States is hereby given to George H. Hervey, of Pensacola, Fla., to," and insert: "That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to give to George H. Hervey, of Pensacola, Fla., his heirs, successors, and assigns, a permit to."

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MOUNT RAINIER NATIONAL PARK.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3928) to accept the cession by the State of Washington of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Mount Rainier National Park, and for other purposes, which were, on page 8, line 2, to strike out "sections" and insert "section," and on page 8, line 2, to strike out "and twelve."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LANDS IN WASHINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3132) providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, which were, on page 2, to strike out lines 20 to 25, inclusive, and lines 1 to 9, inclusive, on page 3, and insert "one who has, since said date, succeeded to the occupation and interest of any such prior settler, his heirs or assigns, shall be entitled to purchase the lands so occupied, not exceeding 20 acres to each settler, according to the Government surveys and subdivisions thereof, upon payment to the Government of a sum equal to the amount of the appraised valuation of same; said appraisal to be made under the direction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in accordance with regulations to be approved by him: Provided, That in making such appraisal no account shall be taken of roads, wharves, or other general improvements in connection with said lands, nor of any improvements made thereon, but the same shall be appraised as nearly as may be as they were at the time when first settled upon: And provided further, That payment to the Government may be made in one sum, or one-tenth cash and the balance in nine equal annual instalments, with interest at 4 per cent per annum, as the purchaser may elect: Provided, That any purchaser under the provisions of this section shall not thereafter have the right to make a homestead entry"; to strike out all of section 4 and insert: "SEC. 4. That if application to purchase any of the lands described in section 1 hereof be not filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the provisions of section 2 hereof, within one year after the approval of regulations for purchase, then, in that event, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to dispose of such remaining lands under the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, entitled 'An act to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations'"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes."

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLARGED HOMESTEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8654) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909, by adding a new section to be known as section 7, which was, in line 4 of the Senate amendment, after the word "entry," where it last occurs, to insert "if the entryman is residing on his former entry."

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND IN LEMMON, S. DAK.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3203) granting to the city of Lemmon, S. Dak., certain lands for reservoir purposes, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause an appraisement to be made of the land, exclusive of all improvements, embraced in the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 10 and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 11, in township 129 north, of range 92 west of the fifth principal meridian, in the county of Adams and the State of North Dakota and in the Dickinson, N. Dak., land district, containing 80 acres; and upon the payment of the appraised price by the city of Lemmon, in the State of South Dakota, to convey by patent to said city of Lemmon the said land"; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to the city of Lemmon, S. Dak."

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3722) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near the city of Baton Rouge, La., which were, in line 7, to strike out the word "three" and insert "two"; and in line 7 to strike out the word "six" and insert "five."

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3580) releasing the claim of the United States Government to lot No. 306 in the old city of Pensacola, Fla., which was, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "remissing" and insert "remising."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENT TO LAND IN PENSACOLA, FLA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3581) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to that portion of land, being a fractional block, bounded on the north and east of Bayou Cadet, on the west by Cevallos Street, and on the south by Intendencia Street, in the old city of Pensacola, in the State of Florida, which was, on page 1, line 4, to strike out the word "remissing" and insert "remising."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND AND WATER POWER ON MUSKINGUM RIVER, OHIO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4026) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to abrogate a contract lease of land and water power on the Muskingum River, Ohio, which were, in line 3, after "That," to insert "upon the payment of an additional $8,800 by the lessees to the United States Government, to be paid within six months after this act is approved and with the understanding that no part of the moneys paid by the lessees to the United States Government shall ever be refunded, and in satisfaction of all claims of both parties"; in lines 3 and 4, to strike out ", and he is hereby directed"; in line 11, after "Ohio," to strike out the remainder of the line and lines 12 and 13.

Mr. HARDING. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTRIC LIGHT AND POWER IN HAWAII.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5777) to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric light and power within the Lihue district and the Koloa district, county of Kauai, Territory of Hawaii, which were, on page 1, after line 2, to insert: "That the act of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii entitled 'An act to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric light and power within the Lihue district and the Koloa district, county of Kauai, Territory of Hawaii,' approved by the governor of the Territory April 30, 1913, is hereby amended by Congress, and as thus amended is hereby ratified, approved, and confirmed, as follows:

"'Act 153. An act to authorize and provide for the manufacture, maintenance, distribution, and supply of electric light and power within the Lihue district and the Koloa district, county of Kauai, Territory of Hawaii.

"'Be it enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, sec. 1.'"

On page 12, to strike out lines 13 to 16, inclusive, and to amend the title so as to read: "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, as amended by Congress, relating to the granting of a franchise for the purpose of manufacturing, maintaining, distributing, and supplying of electric light and power within the Lihue district and the Koloa district, county of Kauai, Territory of Hawaii."

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 13383, known as the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13383) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendments, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts," on page 7, after line 12, to strike out "To pay the actual and necessary expenses of transportation and subsistence, including the transportation of household and personal effects, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts or when traveling under orders of the Secretary of State, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $125,000," and insert:

To pay the cost of the transportation of diplomatic and consular officers in going to and returning from their posts, or when traveling under the orders of the Secretary of State, at the rate of 5 cents per mile, but not including any expense incurred in connection with leaves of absence, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," on page 9, line 3, after the words "Revised Statutes," to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the President to meet unforeseen emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and to extend the commercial and other interests of the United States, and to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes, $150,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1916, which is hereby reappropriated and made available for this purpose: Provided, That in his discretion the President may employ part of this fund for payment for personal services in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, notwithstanding the provisions of any existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico," on page 10, line 25, after the word "Mexico," to strike out "$17,000" and insert "$22,500," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the commission to continue its work under the treaties of 1884, 1889, 1905, and the protocol of May 6, 1896, between the United States and Mexico, $22,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Boundary line, Alaska and Canada, and the United States and Canada," on page 11, line 15, after the words "salaries of," to strike out "the commissioner and the necessary engineers, surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks in the field and at the seat of government, rental of offices at Washington, D. C., expense of printing and necessary traveling, for payment for timber necessarily cut in determining the boundary line not to exceed $500," and insert "surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks at the seat of government," and on page 12, line 1, before the words "together with," to strike out "$111,000" and insert "$75,000," so as to make the clause read:

To enable the Secretary of State to mark the boundary and make the surveys incidental thereto between the Territory of Alaska and the Dominion of Canada, in conformity with the award of the Alaskan Boundary Tribunal and existing treaties, including employment at the seat of government of such surveyors, computers, draftsmen, and clerks as are necessary; and for the more effective demarcation and mapping, pursuant to the treaty of April 11, 1908, between the United States and Great Britain, of the land and water boundary line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, as established under existing treaties, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, including the salaries of surveyors, draftsmen, computers, and clerks at the seat of government, and commutation to members of the field force while on field duty or actual expenses not exceeding $2.50 per day each, to be expended in accordance with regulations from time to time prescribed by the Secretary of State, $75,000, together with the unexpended balance of previous appropriations for these objects: Provided, That hereafter advances of money under the appropriation "Boundary line, Alaska and Canada, and the United States and Canada," may be made to the commissioner on the part of the United States and by his authority to chiefs of parties, who shall give bond under such rules and regulations and in such sum as the Secretary of State may direct, and accounts arising under advances shall be rendered through and by the commissioner on the part of the United States to the Treasury Department as under advances heretofore made to chiefs of parties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pan American Union," on page 13, line 4, after the words "Pan American Union," to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$75,000," so as to make the clause read:

Pan American Union, $75,000: Provided, That any moneys received from the other American Republics for the support of the union shall be paid into the Treasury as a credit, in addition to the appropriation, and may be drawn therefrom upon requisitions of the chairman of the governing board of the union for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the union and of carrying out the orders of said governing board: And provided further, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the monthly bulletin, not to exceed 6,000 copies per month, for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question. I have been away from the city for two weeks, the two weeks covered by the Chicago and St. Louis conventions. I have just returned, and have not had time to examine this bill. On page 13 is an item under the heading "Pan American Union." I should like to ask if that is intended to cover the expenses of printing the proceedings of the convention held here in December and January last?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is a lump sum, and I take it that under this provision authority is given to use this entire appropriation. We have given exactly what the department estimated, which was $75,000. The House, for some reason, increased that amount by adding $10,000 over the estimate. We saw no reason whatever, when the department itself only estimated for $75,000, why we should make it $85,000. No reason was given to us why the increase of $10,000 should be made, and therefore we put it back to $75,000.

Mr. STONE. I have a letter dated May 11 from the Secretary of State, and I understand a similar letter was transmitted to the Committee on Appropriations. I will read just a line or two from it. Referring to some previous statements which had been made to the committees, he says:

The statement shows that out of the total amount appropriated by the Congress—$85,000—there is an estimated balance of $311.30. In other words, there are not sufficient funds to provide for the publication of the proceedings and the secretary general's report.

Without reading this whole letter I will read a line or two in the concluding paragraph, which is as follows:

I feel that the Government of the United States is in honor bound to begin at once the publication of the proceedings of the last congress, and I venture to hope that the item of $42,000, to be expended solely for printing purposes, may be included in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is the first time I have heard anything of this at all. It was never sent to the committee, and no request on the subject that I can remember was made at all. I know nothing about it. This is the first time I have ever heard of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator will notice that in the latter part of this provision it says:

That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized to print an edition of the monthly bulletin not to exceed 6,000 copies per month for distribution by the union during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

Mr. STONE. Yes; but that is a wholly different thing.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the regular bulletin.

Mr. STONE. That is the regular bulletin issued by the Pan American Union.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should not think the cost of publishing the proceedings of the convention could amount to more than a thousand or two thousand dollars. We have these reports of the Trans-Mississippi Congress and such things as that, and they never amount to a great deal.

Mr. STONE. I do not know anything about it beyond what is stated in this table:

Statement showing receipts and expenditures for the Second Pan American Scientific Congress, and also outstanding obligations.

I assumed that this table had been sent to the Committee on Appropriations. All I know about it is that this was an international meeting of very great importance, held here on the invitation of this Government, and attended by leading financiers and public men from all the Central and South American States; and that in the case of the previous congress, held, I think, in Buenos Aires, the proceedings of the congress were printed in English and Spanish, and all the people of these countries, or at least all their representatives attending here, are expecting the United States, as in the former case, to print the proceedings of the convention. As to what it would reasonably cost to print it, I am not at this moment sufficiently advised to make a definite statement. All I know is that in the letter the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] holds in his hand, in the concluding paragraph, it is estimated that it will require $42,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the statement the Senator has from the department gives an account of the expenditure of the appropriation of $85,000 made by Congress for the Pan American Scientific Congress.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not this appropriation in this bill, and the statement shows that all of that money has been expended with the exception of $311.30.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Included in the estimated expenditures and outstanding obligations yet to be paid is an item of $8,500 for printing the final act and commentary of the Second Pan American Scientific Congress in both English and Spanish. In other words, that is provided for in the appropriation of $85,000 that has been already made. I will state to the Senator, though, that in the letter from which he was reading I find this statement:

The Spanish text is still in course of preparation. The necessity for the immediate publication of the final act is obvious when it is recalled that it was prepared under the direction of the executive committee of the congress, composed of one representative from each of the participating countries, and that a draft of the final act was submitted to and subsequently approved by the whole congress in joint session. The total expenditure for its publication in the two languages is approximately $8,500.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HITCHCOCK in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me that the letter from which the Senator has been reading has nothing to do with the appropriation here.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what I said.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I stated.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am aware that it has nothing to do with the particular item on page 13; but inasmuch as that referred to the Pan American Union, I took occasion at that point to call attention to this and to make inquiry about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I understand what the Senator is doing. He is calling attention to a matter that was not submitted to our committee. If he wants to introduce an amendment to carry out that purpose we shall be glad to hear it; but as far as this item is concerned, it has nothing to do with it.

Mr. STONE. I know it has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. We appropriated last year the sum of $15,085 for all these expenses, and they have still an available balance of $311.30. I do not know whether they could pay for this printing out of it or not, or what they could do with the $85,000, but it has no relation whatever to this.

Mr. STONE. I have stated that it has no relation to the item, but I was asking whether there was in the bill—I have not read it as reported—anything covering the matter I am talking about.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is nothing at all covering it.

Mr. STONE. Of course I could offer an amendment on the subject, but I do not know just what amendment to offer.

Mr. SMOOT. This states what it is. I will say to the Senator that it seems to me that the following paragraph explains the whole purpose of the request. It says:

The total expenditure for its publication in the two languages is approximately $8,500.

That is provided for in the $85,000 already appropriated, leaving a balance of $311.30. Then it proceeds and says:

There remain to be published, therefore, the secretary general's report, which will be a brief and inexpensive document, and the proceedings of the congress itself. In connection with the publication of the proceedings I desire to inclose a copy of a note from Mr. Glen Levin Swiggett, assistant secretary general of the congress, to Mr. William Phillips, chairman ex officio of the executive committee, which states that $42,000 will be required for this purpose, and that this amount is less than half of the sum which the Chilean Government actually expended in the publication of the proceedings of the First Pan American Scientific Congress, which was held under its auspices in 1908–9.

So the amendment will have to provide an appropriation of $42,000 to pay for printing the proceedings of the congress. That is what this requires.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Utah to say that that has reference to printing the proceedings of the Financial Conference held here in Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. The $42,000 is to pay for printing the proceedings of the congress held here in Washington.

Mr. FLETCHER. In the two languages, English and Spanish?

Mr. SMOOT. In the two languages. The letter also states that that is not half what was expended by the Chilean Government for printing the proceedings of the first congress, held in Chile.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from North Carolina, as soon as we are through with the committee amendments, or after that, I will offer an amendment to the bill at some suitable point, inserting $42,000 for the purpose indicated, and let it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill. This discussion is all out of order now.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is very agreeable for the Senator to do that after we get through the committee amendments. I want to say that last year we appropriated the sum of $15,000 for this scientific congress. They show here an itemized statement of $85,000 expended. They have had from time to time appropriations for this scientific congress, and I suppose this is an estimate for that; but there has been no estimate made to either House for this $42,000. It is not in the bill at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill for committee amendments.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International radiotelegraphic convention," on page 17, line 6, after the word "Switzerland," to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$2,250," so as to make the clause read:

International radiotelegraphic convention: For the share of the United States for the calendar year 1917, as a party to the international radiotelegraphic conventions heretofore signed, of the expenses of the radiotelegraphic service of the International Bureau of the Telegraphic Union at Berne, Switzerland, $2,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Waterways treaty, United States and Great Britain: International Joint Commission, United States and Great Britain," on page 18, line 9, after the date "1909," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$70,000," and in line 13, after the words "Secretary of State," to strike out:

Provided, That not to exceed the sum of $5,000 shall be expended for the payment for services rendered under the direction of the Secretary of State in the examination and preparation of cases involving the use, distribution, or diversion of waters and other questions or matters of difference covered by the treaty of January 11, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain, and in representing this Government and the American interests involved in the presentation of such case before the International Joint Commission constituted under that treaty: Provided, That no part of the appropriation shall be expended for subsistence of the commission, counsel, and secretary, except for necessary actual expenses, a sum not exceeding $10 per day each, when absent from Washington on official business.

And insert:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for subsistence of the commission or secretary, except $8 per day each, when absent from Washington on official business.

So as to make the clause read:

For salaries and expenses, including salaries of commissioners and salaries of clerks and other employees appointed by the commissioners on the part of the United States, with the approval solely of the Secretary of State, including rental of offices at Washington, D. C., expense of printing, and necessary traveling expenses, and for one-half of all reasonable and necessary joint expenses of the International Joint Commission incurred under the terms of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the use of boundary waters between the United States and Canada, and for other purposes, signed January 11, 1909, $70,000, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this object for the fiscal year 1915, said amounts to be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of State: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for subsistence of the commission or secretary, except $8 per day each, when absent from Washington on official business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 6, to insert:

For payment of services rendered and expenses incurred under the direction of the Secretary of State in the examination and preparation of cases involving the obstruction, diversion, and use of boundary waters and all other questions or matters of difference covered by the treaty of January 11, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain, and in appearing before and representing the interests of the United States involved in all matters or investigations before the International Joint Commission created by said treaty, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 3, after the word "expenses," to strike out "in Washington City," so as to make the clause read:

Nineteenth Conference Interparliamentary Union: The appropriation of $40,000 "For the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to the Nineteenth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union to be held in Washington in 1915, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe," made in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, is hereby extended and made available for the calendar years 1916 and 1917.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 18, after the word "prescribe," to insert "$10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, together with," and in line 21, after the words "United States," to strike out "is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917," so as to make the clause read:

Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism: To complete the arrangements and provide for the entertainment of the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism to be held in the United States, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe, $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, together with the unexpended balance of previous appropriations for the holding of said congress in the United States: Provided, That an itemized account of all expenditures shall be reported to Congress: Provided further, That no part of the appropriation herein made shall be expended for entertainment outside the city of Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have been absent from the city and was not at the committee meeting when this bill was passed upon; but it does seem to me that we are increasing such appropriation every year, and I think it is unnecessary. I remember that a year ago, when we were discussing an appropriation for this conference of $6,850, I offered an amendment proposing that it be decreased to $4,500, to pay the expenses of 10 delegates to the congress. I predicted at that time that the next appropriation asked for would be $10,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator is alluding to one thing, and this is another. This is the International Congress Against Alcoholism, to be held in this country. What the Senator alludes to is the Nineteenth Conference of the Interparliamentary Union, which probably will not be held.

Mr. SMOOT. I am speaking of an appropriation for the International Congress Against Alcoholism.

Mr. OVERMAN. The congress is to meet here. We have invited them to come, against the Senator's protest and mine, and we have got to provide for them. The Senator is talking about one thing, and this is another. I remember his amendment very well.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we have appropriated for this congress every year.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has not been held. It is just a continuing appropriation. They have never held the congress.

Mr. SMOOT. The Congress appropriated last year to pay the expenses of 10 delegates to be appointed by the President to take a trip to Europe to attend the International Congress Against Alcoholism.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; this one is to be held here.

Mr. SMOOT. I am aware of that, but what I mean to say is this: Every year an appropriation is asked for the purpose of holding a conference somewhere of the International Congress Against Alcoholism.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not here.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not here, but it is held somewhere, and the President appoints delegates. Last year he appointed 10 delegates to go to Europe; I do not know just where it was held. I called attention then to the fact that $6,850 was an increase over and above what they had asked for before, and I offered an amendment decreasing it to $4,500, and it was carried, and also a proviso on the amendment that there should be not to exceed 10 delegates to that Congress appointed. I also stated at that time that I had no doubt but that the amount asked for this year would be $10,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is not for delegates.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I am aware that it is not for delegates, but it is for the purpose of holding this congress here. I should like to ask somebody whether or not there is a report of what the money is to be expended for.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is just like the estimates for all of them—the Interparliamentary Union and every other convention. When Congress invites an international convention to come here, we have to treat them right when we do it; that is all. The question is whether or not we are going to do it. If we are going to do it, we have to treat them right.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator that wherever the invitation is extended we have to pay the bills; but what I should like to know is whether it is actually necessary that an extra $10,000 shall be expended upon this Congress in entertaining delegates. If it is, I am not going to object.

Mr. STONE. I should like to inquire of both the Senators whether they know, as a matter of fact, that the former invitation for this meeting was extended by the authority of Congress?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was, Mr. President, in an appropriation bill.

Mr. STONE. When?

Mr. SMOOT. A year ago.

Mr. STONE. I will say that a great number of joint resolutions are introduced for all kinds of congresses and conventions and usually they are referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Some time ago that committee adopted as a committee policy a general rule against recommending to Congress the passage of such joint resolutions for the reason that although in numerous instances the resolutions carried a proviso that the Government should not be involved in any expense, yet afterwards a request came to the Committees on Appropriations for the insertion of items to cover the expenses.

I can not recall without examining the records of the Committee on Foreign Relations the exact action taken on the resolution in this case, which I am quite sure was referred to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have it here and I desire to read it to the Senate. This is the invitation:

The appropriation of $40,000 "For the purpose of defraying the expenses incident to the Fifteenth International Congress Against Alcoholism, to be held in the United States in 1915, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe," made in the "act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915," is hereby extended and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. The Secretary of State is hereby authorized and requested to extend an invitation to the Governments of the world with which we maintain diplomatic relations to participate in and appoint delegates to said congress: Provided, That an itemized account of all expenditures shall be reported to Congress.

There was $40,000 appropriated, and we are now appropriating $10,000 additional, making $50,000 for this Congress. I should like to ask if there is any itemized statement as to the expenses to be met and why the additional $10,000 is asked, making $50,000?

Mr. OVERMAN. There could not be any itemized expenses, because the convention has not been held.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why not let the item go out, and if it is held, pay the $10,000 additional if necessary?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no idea myself that they are going to hold it this year, but there is no harm in putting in this item. If the convention is not held, the money will not be expended. We have invited them to come here and we want to be prepared. So those representing the prohibitionists in the country asked for this appropriation. They said it was necessary, and we agreed to give it to them. I have no idea in the world that the convention will be held the coming year or that a dollar of the money will be spent, but we want to have it ready in case it is held.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a very loose way of legislating.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 22, to strike out:

Purchase and repair, consular premises: Purchase, alteration, and repair of consular premises or purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a suitable building or buildings, for the use of the consulate general at Shanghai, including the residences of officers, $150,000.

And to insert:

Building at Shanghai, China: For purchase, alteration, and repair of consular premises or purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a suitable building or buildings, for the use of the consulate general and the United States court, jail, post office, marshal's and other Government offices at Shanghai, including the residences of officers, $355,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, after line 9, to strike out:

Embassy premises at Tokyo, Japan: The provision for the acquisition of embassy premises at Tokyo, Japan, contained in the act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, approved June 30, 1914, is hereby amended to read as follows: "For the construction of a building on ground now held by the Government of the United States at Tokyo, Japan, or for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building thereon as the Secretary of State may elect for the use of the embassy to Japan both as a residence of the diplomatic officers and for the offices of the embassy and for furnishing the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the subhead "Expenses of consular inspectors," on page 24, line 24, after $15,000, to insert: "Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence not exceeding an average of $5 per day"; so as to make the clause read:

For the actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses of consular inspectors while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State, $15,000: Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence not exceeding an average of $5 per day.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would have no objection at all to the amendment if it read in the ordinary way, but there are inserted in it the words "an average of." I do not believe that there ever was a provision of that kind adopted by the Senate before. I am sure it is not a good thing to begin to pay subsistence and expenses to any employee of the Government on an average basis. Therefore I shall move to strike out the words "an average of"; so that the amendment will read:

Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence not exceeding $5 per day.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to explain that item to the Senator. We are doing things now that we do not ordinarily do, on account of the troubles abroad. The Secretary of State was before us. He wanted $10 a day for these inspectors. These inspectors travel all over the world, and it is very hard for them to live on $5 a day now. We refused to allow them $10 a day, but they said they could get along by making an average, that sometimes an inspector could live on $3 a day and sometimes it would cost $10 a day. Therefore we thought we would put in the provision as it stands. It is something unusual I admit, but it is done on account of the conditions abroad. These inspectors travel in Europe and in South America, and it is impossible for them to live in some places on less than $10 a day. We did not want to give them $10 a day, and we concluded to put in the words "an average of."

Mr. TOWNSEND. What does the Senator mean "by an average of $5 a day"?

Mr. JONES. I will state that it means that the actual daily expenses shall not exceed on an average $5 a day; that is, if at one place it costs $10 and another place it costs nothing there is an average of $5 a day allowed.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Michigan this is what it means, that all the consular inspectors under this provision will be allowed $1,825 for necessary expenses for subsistence during the year.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It means $5 a day straight.

Mr. SMOOT. It means $5 for every day in the year.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me correct the Senator. The Senator said all consuls. There are only four.

Mr. SMOOT. I said consular inspectors.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator said consuls, and there are thousands of those and only four of these.

Mr. SMOOT. If I said consuls I meant to say consular inspectors. Whatever the number may be, it means that they are to be allowed $1,825 a year for their subsistence. They may not be in the actual service of the Government all the time—they may work only six months in the year, but under this amendment they will be entitled to $1,825 for the year, even though they work only half the time.

I would much prefer to give an allowance of $8 a day than to have an amendment of this kind, so broad in its scope. I believe the committee is making a mistake in putting in this language.

Mr. OVERMAN. We had to leave some discretion to the Secretary of State. He said that all the matter of expenses came to him to look over, and unless he could give as much as $10 a day they could not live in many places to which they go. He said as the account is submitted to him he could make an average of it, and he thought he might get along with an allowance of $5 a day, if it were put in as an average.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be through in a moment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. As soon as I make a statement I will yield the floor. I have already given notice of an amendment to strike out the words "an average of." I wish also to state that if that amendment is carried I shall offer an amendment increasing the rate from $5 per day to $8 per day, so that there will be no question about what Congress intends, and following out the past practices in appropriating for the expense of subsistence.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Utah will not prevail, for I believe that the provision which is here contained is much better than that which is offered by the Senator. The situation as I understand it is that in certain places they charge these persons at first-class hotels $10 a day. Buenos Aires is one of them. It is said that you can not get fair accommodations at Buenos Aires for less than $10 per day, and the department wants those persons to stop at first-class hotels. And yet we did not want the average amount they receive to be more than $5. If the Senator puts in an $8 provision I believe these agents will draw $8 for every day, and that is not the object of this proviso. The object is that on the average during the year while they are at work they shall receive $5 per day. I do not take it that the provision here includes the time when they are not at work, but while they are traveling, while they are conducting this particular line of business, they will receive on an average $5 per day.

Mr. POMERENE. Will it not meet the objection raised by the Senator from Utah and at the same time meet the desire or the thought of the committee if you were to add a provision to this effect, making these expenditures subject to the approval of the Secretary of State?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what they are.

Mr. SHAFROTH. They are already subject to his approval. They stated to us that it was only on extraordinary occasions that they would allow anything more at all, but they want to allow it in those cases where they think it is absolutely imperative that that amount should be spent.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Does not the Senator think that as the amendment is written now it will be construed as other like provisions are construed, that it means $5 a day for subsistence?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think not, because the words "an average of" are there, and it seems to me it would indicate that there will be some extraordinary expenses at some time and at another time the expenses will be lower than $5 a day.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think the Senator does not get my view. My view is that if the language remains as it is it means simply a straight $5 a day the year through.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see why that should be the case when the bills have to be audited for necessary traveling expenses.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator is perfectly familiar with the like language in regard to the payment of judges in the United States courts when they are away from their own districts.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether the language is the same or not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will tell you how the language is. It is "not to exceed $10 a day," and yet the construction is always that they shall be allowed the full and complete $10 a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why we did not leave it like the House fixed it. The Senator will notice that the House put it at $10 a day, and for that very reason we struck it out. We have another provision here for the arbitration board at $10 a day. We asked them the question, Does it take $10 every day?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is just the point.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Exactly.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason why we changed it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. When you say $5 a day, it will take $5 a day.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not with the language inserted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator makes no limitation as to how long it is to be counted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This language seems to be very plain:

Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence not exceeding an average of $5 per day.

If the necessary and actual expenses amount to only $4 a day, I do not see how any auditor, unless it is certified that the expense is $5 a day, can certify that they are entitled to that amount of money. They may get around it in some way, but, as a matter of fact, it would be in violation of the language instead of being in compliance with the language.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The only difficulty is the courts and the auditors have already construed like language under other provisions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt but if their expenditures are $5 a day the auditor will approve it; but the person has to make an affidavit that they are his actual expenses.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; they do not have to make an itemized statement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If you want to put in the words "itemized statement," I think that would be all right.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I was just calling the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the condition as it exists in other cases where like provisions are made.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What would the Senator from Utah think of making it read "actual and necessary expenses for subsistence itemized"?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then why should a limitation of $5 per day be made? They surely ought to have their actual expenses paid.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; there is a good deal of difference between going to a hotel and saying, "I want a $4 room" and saying, "I want a $2 room."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But the Senator is talking about the actual and necessary expense itemized.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is all true; but there is a good deal of difference between an itemized account where one is $2 and another is $4.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that these inspectors, agents of the Government, have to make itemized statements. I have seen whole stacks of them and have gone through them in committee where they proved that they can not live in Alaska on the same per diem that they can live on in this country. I do not think there is anything to be gained by putting in the word "itemized" there, because that is required.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But it would do no hurt to insert it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I remember when this matter came up in the committee, the representatives of the State Department were there and called attention to the fact that in some places the inspectors could not get anything like suitable accommodations for $5 a day, and at other places they could get suitable accommodations for less than $5 a day, but under the language of the law as it stands the proper officials of the department who would have the construction of these matters have held that where a man was required to pay, for instance, only $2.50 a day that was all he was allowed. Then when he went to a place where he had to pay $10 a day he could be allowed $5, the amount set out in the law, but he could not offset any of the excess payment at one place over against the minimum amount at another place. We were informed that there are several places where they could not possibly live on $5 a day and there were other places where they could live for less, and the question was suggested whether we should not put it on an average, so that if a man spent $2 at one place and $10 at another there could be an allowance made not exceeding a certain amount. That is the reason why this provision was put in.

The Senator from Colorado has called attention to the language here, that the inspectors are allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence. As I understand, that language requires an itemized statement of what is actual and necessary, and they can not get any credit for anything over $5. So, if these statements show that at one place a certain amount is paid, at another place a certain other amount, and at another place a different amount, while it all amounts to more than $5 a day for every day that is accounted for, they can be allowed but $5 for each day, and no more.

It seems to me that the language is plain. I do not know what the construction of the courts has been. Personally I think it would be better for us to do even in this case what we have done on page 19—fix a specific sum per diem that we will allow for subsistence.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Washington make that motion?

Mr. JONES. We did not see fit to do that in this case, after talking with the representatives of the department, but we put it in this way so as to take care of these different situations. I myself should have no objection to giving the consular inspectors a straight sum per diem, but I think this is better than what the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has suggested—very decidedly better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 1, in the amendment of the committee, after the word "exceeding," it is proposed to strike out "an average of $5" and to insert "$8," so as to read:

Provided, That inspectors shall be allowed actual and necessary expenses for subsistence not exceeding $8 per day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment—after the word "subsistence," on page 25, line 1, to insert the word "itemized"—inasmuch as some seem to think that the language which is here used authorizes these inspectors to draw $5 a day, irrespective as to whether or not they have spent that sum. We know that these expenses are itemized, yet it will do no harm to insert the word "itemized" at that point.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment of the committee proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 1, after the word "subsistence," it is proposed to insert the word "itemized," so that it will read "necessary expenses for subsistence, itemized, not exceeding an average of $5 per day."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Salaries of consular assistants," on page 25, after line 5, to insert:

Post allowances to consular officers: To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto in order to adjust their official income to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $150,000.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the members of the committee, and of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] especially, to the amendment which has just been read. I desire to inquire whether or not the estimates made by the department were cut down by the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when this matter was before the other House the House committee cut down the estimates from $225,000 to $100,000. We had the representative of the Secretary of State before us, and after looking into the matter we concluded to increase the sum over that reported by the House committee. This is the greatest increase we have made in the bill. We have increased the amount to $150,000, and we think that is more than ample.

South American countries are not at war; there is no trouble there. Mr. Lansing said he desired the appropriation for the whole world, but we thought $150,000 would cover the extraordinary expenses incurred in belligerent countries.

I forgot to state that the House declined to make any appropriation for this purpose. The House committee reported $100,000, but the House of Representatives itself struck out the whole appropriation. I think the Senator from Missouri ought to be satisfied with putting it at $150,000, in view of the action of the House striking out the appropriation when the committee of that body had reported in favor of an appropriation of only $100,000.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my friend from North Carolina speaks of my being satisfied. Of course, it is a matter of no more consequence to me whether the appropriation is greater or less than it is to the Senator from North Carolina or to any other Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I appreciate that.

Mr. STONE. I am simply calling attention to a situation as it has been stated to me by the Secretary of State in connection with a table showing an increase in the cost of living in the various belligerent countries.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have that statement here.

Mr. STONE. I have no doubt the Senator has the same data as have I. The Secretary of State also inclosed to me a letter from our ambassador at Vienna, showing, for example, that the increased cost of living there runs from 200 to 300 per cent, due to the European War, and in other countries from 22 per cent to 61 per cent, to 75 per cent, to 100 per cent, to 150 per cent, and so on. I shall not read that table, but I have quoted just enough to indicate the enormous increase in the cost of living.

The particular letter which I hold in my hand and the particular table to which I have referred relate only to embassies or to legations and not to the Consular Service at all. It was urged here by the department that $75,000 as a minimum should be appropriated to cover the enormous increase in the cost of living not to the ambassador or to the minister but to the under officials.

There was another letter—the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] received one—from the Secretary of State relating to the consular force, where the same conditions applied, asking that $150,000——

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me interrupt the Senator from Missouri. All of this provision refers to the Consular Service. These officials are called consular assistants. Numerous clerks are employed while the war lasts, and they have to be provided for. For example, Great Britain and these other countries being at war, the United States has to take care of the interests of every belligerent nation. To do that additional clerks are required, who are called consular assistants, and this provision applies only to such assistants. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] are both talking about the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; we are not.

Mr. OVERMAN. They are, according to Mr. Lansing; I myself do not know.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; not according to Mr. Lansing, either. Mr. Lansing has written two letters—one about the Consular Service and one about the Diplomatic Service, if the Senator will pardon me; and he asked $150,000 for the Consular Service and $75,000 for the Diplomatic Service, making in toto $225,000. You have allowed simply for the Consular Service, allowing nothing at all for the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. STONE. At all events, I move to increase the item from $150,000 to $225,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before that motion is put——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 25, line 13, after the word "assigned," it is proposed to strike out "$150,000" and to insert "$225,000."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this matter is one of grave importance, and I should like to have Senators understand it. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, has explained this item. It is not to provide for an ordinary increase of expenses; it is to provide for a war increase, which is temporary in its character; in fact, the whole provision is temporary in its character, even as carried in this bill itself.

I have sent over to my office to attempt to procure a letter which the Secretary of State wrote to me in reference to the consular part of the subject matter. The letter which was written to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] referred simply to the Diplomatic Service; and the Secretary asked for an increase of $75,000 for the Diplomatic Service because of the immense war increase in the cost of living. Of course, an ambassador, with his salary of $17,500, can manage to cheesepare and get along, but the secretaries and all the other employees in subordinate positions—who have never been paid too much, by the way—in our service are finding themselves, to use a slang phrase, "up against it."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the language of the amendment. It includes the Diplomatic and Consular Service.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know it does. The Senator means it includes both as printed in the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But where the Secretary asks for $75,000 for the Diplomatic Service and $150,000 for the Consular Service, the bill bulks them both, and grants $150,000 for both; so that it has granted nothing for the Diplomatic Service at all, and has only granted what he estimated for the Consular Service. That is one way of expressing it. Another way of expressing it is that, instead of granting $225,000 for both, you have granted $150,000 for both.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I merely want to suggest to the Senator that the estimate of $225,000 is a general estimate, covering all of the countries of the world. When that estimate was made they had in mind the conditions in South America, where no war exists. The committee limited this to our consular and diplomatic officers "in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto," and with this limitation we thought that $150,000 was sufficient.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Secretary of State made no estimate for the increased cost of living in countries where there is no increased cost of living. He made an estimate of $225,000 to provide for the increased cost of living in the service. In some countries there has been an increase of 30 per cent; in some of 75 per cent; in some of 100 per cent; in some of 300 per cent; and the estimate was intended to take care of those countries where there was an increased cost of living. The increased cost of living in South American countries, as the Senator from Washington says, has been very small. There has, however, been an increased cost of living even there, owing to the interruption of world trade.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the committee did not feel that they ought to go into a general adjustment on account of the increased cost of living everywhere, because, if we do that, we will be called upon to begin at home, for there has been a great increase here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, Mr. President, the Senator does not seem to understand that this money is not going to be paid out to any employee in any country where there has been no increased cost of living. It is not intended to give so much to each man in the service; but the money is to be paid out at the discretion of the Secretary of State to make up for the increased cost of living where an increase in the cost of living has occurred. It does not affect the man in Rio de Janiero, for example. The Secretary says here—

I append a table—

I will not read all the table—

You will observe that in Berlin the increase in 1915 over 1914 was from 75 to 100 per cent; in Vienna the increase during the same period was 160 per cent—

Mark the figures, because these people who were already just barely adequately paid can hardly eke out an existence with an increased cost of 150 per cent.

In Constantinople, 125 per cent; in Petrograd, 98 per cent; in Athens—

Which is not in a belligerent country—

96 per cent.

And, by the way, you would find the same thing true in Roumania and in all countries which are affected by the war. In the other capitals enumerated there was a substantial increase. He appends a letter from Mr. Penfield. I wish the letter which he wrote to me with regard to the Consular Service were here, so that I might illustrate the matter better.

Take Malta, for instance. I happen to know concerning that island. Malta is a British possession. It is not included directly in the war area, but the increase in the cost of living in Malta, as I am reliably informed, is 75 per cent, as compared with the year previous to the present.

It is true in very many countries which are not in the actual area of the war that the increase has been large, although, of course, nothing approximating the increase in Berlin, in Vienna, and in Belgrade; but there has been an increase in all European countries.

The increase, of course, in Berlin and in Vienna is owing to the fact that their supplies have been cut off; but the increase in the other countries is owing to the disturbance of over-seas commerce, not shutting off supplies, not producing an actual scarcity of food, but I have no doubt causing a great deal of difficulty in procuring supplies, and very much higher freight rates; and the freight rates are, of course, added to the product in Malta and countries similarly situated.

I can not see for the life of me why we should not let the Secretary of State have this money. If he finds that it is not needed, he will not spend it, and he certainly can be relied upon not to expend it anywhere where there has not been an increase in the cost of living.

I noticed an exchange of smiles upon the part of the learned Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the acute Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] when the statement was made that if the Secretary of State did not need to spend the money he would not spend it; but in that I have his assurance, and I rely upon that slightly more than I do upon the jeer of the one or the sneer of the other. I am sure the allowance will not be made to employees in countries where it is not needed, where the men do not have to meet an increase in the cost of living.

I know an instance of one young fellow, a consul at a post not in the war area at all, who wrote me that even there the cost of living had gone up thirty-odd per cent—I have forgotten now the exact figures—and in his letter he told me what he paid for various articles prior to the outbreak of the war and what he was paying for them now.

The language of the provision under discussion is this:

Post allowances to consular officers: To enable the President, in his discretion and in accordance with such regulations as he may prescribe, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to consular and diplomatic officers in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto in order to adjust their official incomes to the ascertained cost of living at the posts to which they may be assigned, $150,000.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] proposes to make that amount $225,000. The words "in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto" can not include South or Central America, although they might include Mexico.

Mr. JONES. That is new language which the committee put in when it limited the amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not care who put it in.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator wants to increase the amount to $225,000, that limitation in the language ought to be eliminated.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It ought not to be, because those are the only countries where the Secretary wants to spend the money. He wants it for use "in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto," where the markets are disturbed by war conditions.

Mr. JONES. He did not submit the estimate in that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am merely citing the language of the bill to show that there would be no discretion in the Secretary of State, if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri were adopted, to expend any of this money for employees in South America or Central America, thus obviating the objection which has just been made by the Senator from Washington. It does not make any difference who worded it; that is the language of the provision.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggested that simply because——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One moment, if the Senator will pardon me. I have just gotten that letter, and I will complete my remarks with some quotations from it. This letter was dated June 20 and was addressed to me, and I think a similar letter was sent to the Senator from Missouri, although he has not it with him and does not remember receiving it:

As you well understand, the war has resulted in enormous advances in the cost of the necessaries of life in most of the belligerent countries, and in many—

I ask the Senator's attention to this, now, because it is the very language you have in here that you say the committee used; and the Secretary is using the exact language in his letter to me, or almost the same language. Here is what he says:

The war has resulted in enormous advances in the cost of the necessaries of life in most of the belligerent countries, and in many of the contiguous neutral countries.

That has been notably the case in Holland.

The diplomatic and consular officers, especially the lower-salaried ones, including the secretaries in the Diplomatic Service, will not long be able to bear the heavy burdens thrown upon them by the war unless they shall receive an allowance which will increase their income in some proportion to the advance in their living expenses. I should be very glad if you could find it in accord with your judgment, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to give your support to the department's recommendation.

And here was the recommendation:

Post allowances for the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $225,000.

Which is exactly what it would be if the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri were put in the bill. Now, the Secretary goes on to say, in a letter written to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], of which a copy was sent to me, what I am about to read now:

When the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, were submitted to Congress, the department had been convinced by the information before it that, owing to the great increase in the cost of living in the belligerent countries and the contiguous neutral countries due to the war, it would be imperative that some provision be made for increasing to some extent the income of the consular officers in those countries and an arbitrary amount of $150,000 was estimated as being necessary for the purpose. Since that estimate was made the department has obtained from all the consular officers detailed and uniform reports of the cost of certain necessary articles of food, clothing, fuel, and rent. A careful comparison of the reports shows a range of increase during the period from July to December, 1915, over the prices prevailing from January to June, 1914, before the war began, of as much in some cases as 250 per cent.

Then the letter goes on to give various instances of that sort, what a table d'hôte dinner costs, what various articles of food cost, and all that, which I will not read:

It will readily be seen that the effect of the abnormal rise in prices of foodstuffs and general cost of living is exceedingly serious, particularly in its relation to secretaries in the Diplomatic Service and to the lower grades of consular officers, whose salaries range from $3,000 to $1,000 a year.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said the committee had reduced the amount because the Secretary offered it and asked it for the entire Diplomatic and Consular Service, but that the committee thought they could safely reduce it because certain South American and Central American countries were not affected. I especially call attention again to the language of the Secretary, both in his letter to me and in his letter to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and to the fact that in both cases he asked it only for positions held in belligerent countries and in contiguous neutral countries; so that there never entered into his mind, nor into the estimate, at any time any idea of South or Central America or China, let us say, and therefore that if the committee reduced the amount with that notion in their heads they founded their conclusion upon what was really no basis at all, because the idea had never been in the Secretary's head. His estimates had never been made upon any such supposition. His estimates had been made solely for belligerent countries and countries contiguous to belligerents; and there was no ground, therefore, to reduce what he asked upon the idea that South and Central America or China would not have to have it.

I need not read all of this letter. It has been read to the committee, I suppose.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is all in the record.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then he goes on to say that after his first estimate, and then getting these uniform and universal reports, the department had come to the conclusion that $225,000 was the least amount with which they could get along; and in the letter to the Senator from Missouri and in the letter to me it will be seen why that final estimate was made—$150,000 for the Consular Service and $75,000 for the Diplomatic Service.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the committee did have a basis for cutting this to $150,000, and based it upon the language of the bill and the formal estimates of the department. The first estimate of the department for $225,000 was in general terms, for the Consular and Diplomatic Service everywhere. The department sent its representatives down to the committee. They were heard by the committee; they were questioned by the committee, and their testimony showed that they did have in mind taking care of the increase in the cost of living in South America. They said so. The committee did not think we ought in the Consular and Diplomatic Service to enter upon a general scheme of taking care of the increased cost of living of all the employees there and let all the other employees of the Government go without taking care of the increased cost of living to which they have been subjected the same as those in the Consular Service. The committee did realize and appreciate, however, the fact that there were very exceptional conditions in the belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto, and so the committee put that language expressly in the provisions of the bill and limited the amount to $150,000.

This provision was in the bill as reported to the House, and there the words "belligerent and contiguous countries" were not a part of the provision. The provision in the House was in accordance with the formal estimates submitted by the State Department. It went out there on a point of order and, of course, came to the committee here for consideration, and this is what we concluded to put in after taking into account all the suggestions that the Senator from Mississippi has made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator, also, that the total appropriation for the whole service, for all the countries of the world, is only $1,100,000, and we have given practically a 20 per cent increase in all the salaries in the belligerent countries. The whole appropriation for all the Consular Service is only a little over a million dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state that I do not believe there ought to be any change from the amendment which has been proposed by the committee. I notice, in the report which was made by the chairman of the committee, that there is provision made here for emergencies in the Diplomatic and Consular Service, including $75,000 in the urgent deficiency act of 1916, and he puts under the estimate for 1917, $200,000. If that is true—if this $75,000 is to be included in this $200,000—the estimate of the department would be only $125,000. So, in view of the fact that the House struck out the provision entirely, not allowing anything whatever for the increase, the subcommittee recommending $100,000 and the general committee raising it to $150,000, it seems to me that that is as far as we ought to go.

There is this that can be said with relation to the matter also: If this is an absolute necessity, an urgent deficiency bill can be brought in at any time for the purpose of relieving the situation. But in view of the fact that here now we have an increased amount that is very large, and we do not know whether or not it will be sufficient to take care of the situation, but think it is ample, it seems to me that we will do well to let it go at this amount—$150,000 more than the House has allowed—with the power which Congress always has, when it finds it absolutely necessary, to bring in an urgent deficiency bill.

It seems to me that the committee amendment ought to stand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope the amount will not be changed, for this reason: It will be impossible for the department to spend more than $150,000 in the seven months beginning July 1 and going to February 1. By February 1, the next session of Congress being a short one, we will have another Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill before us, and if there is any deficiency at all it will be taken care of either in a deficiency appropriation bill or in the regular appropriation bill. For that reason I do not believe that it is necessary to increase this amount.

Mr. STONE. How could there be a deficiency bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we have them every year. If Congress provides an appropriation for this particular work, the Secretary of State will arrange the amount that will be paid to each of the consular and diplomatic officers, and then it will be paid regularly.

Mr. STONE. This is an emergency.

Mr. SMOOT. I know this is an emergency, and I think it will take care of the amount that will have to be paid, at least until we pass another Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill. I want to say to the Senator that we can not deny the fact that where there is a liberal appropriation made to any department they spend the money more freely than they do when there is a reasonable amount provided.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if this appropriation is to be limited in the way suggested by the committee, then necessarily the State Department, in making its allowances, will have to be controlled by what we have authorized here, and I very much fear that that is not going to be sufficient. We realize, in our shipments from this country, that freight and passenger charges are very much higher than they were before this war began, and, in my judgment, it has affected the cost of living in all of these countries.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I am not quite in harmony with the action of the committee confining the appropriation to belligerent countries, because we all know that there is not a country of any importance in the world where the cost of living has not advanced. Whether they are involved in the war or not, everything has increased on account of the war, as everybody knows; and, of course, the way the amendment is worded it simply takes care of the officers in belligerent countries and countries contiguous thereto.

I do believe that the best thing for us to do is to pass the bill with the provision for $150,000—the House having not allowed a cent—and let the Senate stand firm for the $150,000 in conference. I am quite sure that if that is done not more than this amount will be spent before Congress is again in session, and we can then appropriate money to take care of any additional amount, if any, that may be required.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does not the Senator realize that if you go into conference with the Senate asking only $150,000 and the House opposing it, the provision is going to come out of conference with even less than that?

Mr. OVERMAN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I would not agree to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the House has something to say about it.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the House having voted so that there will be nothing at all granted, the chances are that there will be a compromise upon what is in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can assure the Senator that there will not be any compromise, because the House committee did recommend $100,000. We have recommended $150,000; and when the bill was reported to the House by the committee the House would not give anything for this purpose. But the House committee had agreed on $100,000, and we have put it at $150,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why let yourselves be brought to a hopeless halt about this little $75,000 when the Secretary thinks it is necessary, and when he knows, of course, very much more about it than any of us, and when you are spending money this year for other things in the way of preparedness not any more important than this, and spending very much larger sums? My own opinion is that if you go into conference with $150,000 you will come out with about $125,000, between the House committee and your own, and that if you go into conference with $225,000 you will come out with enough.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I just want to say one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is with regard to what the Senator has said about allowing what these Secretaries ask.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I was going to answer.

Mr. OVERMAN. If we had allowed everything that had been asked, we would have bankrupted this country. In other words, we would have allowed $100,000,000 more than the House has allowed. We can not allow everything to these people just because they ask it. We have got to look into it ourselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not saying that. The Senator has never known anything in my life or history that entitles me to be regarded as that stupid. I am arguing this matter from the standpoint of its own merits, and I am arguing that as regards this particular item it ought to be allowed. Of course I am not fool enough to say that whatever a Secretary or Cabinet officer asks should be granted because he asks it; and I would not have to be very smart not to be that big a fool, either.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say, in behalf of the Secretaries and the departments, that it is impossible for them to go into the details of all these appropriations. They accept the word of the head of a bureau or some principal clerk in the bureau and they make their estimates upon the reports from those chiefs. They do not know the details of each one of these matters. They do not pretend to know. When they appear before the Appropriations Committee they always bring these men along to explain why they want an item and why they ask for it, because the Secretaries do not understand, and the letters that they write to us are not written by the Secretaries themselves. They are written by the clerks who make up the amounts.

I say to the Senate now that a practice has grown up in our Government here of asking more than they want, knowing that the committees of the House and the Senate are not going to grant the full amount, and I have heard it stated even before the committee that that is why they have asked for larger amounts than were absolutely necessary.

I do not believe that any of our officers in foreign lands in either the Diplomatic or the Consular Service are going to suffer if we grant the appropriation of $150,000 provided for in this bill; and I will say to the Senator that I believe that the House, with the showing that we have made and the good faith that we have shown here upon the floor, is going to yield in regard to the $150,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that some of them are suffering now, so the prediction that they will not suffer does not carry much force.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is now 2 o'clock. I hope we will vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow us to conclude the consideration of the pending bill. There is but one more amendment and another to be offered, I understand.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One more amendment and another to be offered may occupy all the day.

Mr. OVERMAN. It will not take half an hour. If it does, I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All right, I will yield for half an hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 13, strike out "$150,000" and insert "$225,000."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest, in line 9, page 25, after the word "compensation," there be inserted the words "and expenses," and for this reason: There are many items of additional expense that these consular officers are obliged to pay.

Mr. SMOOT. Not out of their own pockets.

Mr. POMERENE. There may be additional expenses, and so forth. It is to cover the question of compensation because of the increased cost of living and increased duties.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, my attention was diverted. I did not hear his amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. My suggestion was to insert, after the word "compensation," on page 25, line 9, the words "and expenses," so that if there are additional expenses incurred by these consular officers the department might be authorized to allow those expenses as well as the additional compensation.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have a large appropriation to pay actual expenses.

Mr. POMERENE. If it is provided for otherwise, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 20, after line 25, I move to insert:

The duly appointed representative of the United States on the Permanent Commission of the International Geodetic Association is hereby granted authority to vote with the representatives on the permanent commission from other nations on all matters coming before the association, including the extension of its existence, subject to the approval of Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to that amendment. I consent to its adoption.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I send to the desk the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, after line 12, insert:

Second Pan American Scientific Congress: For publication of the proceedings of the Second Pan American Scientific Congress, $42,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. The words "or so much thereof as may be necessary" should be inserted.

Mr. STONE. Very well; "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 16th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 4506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;

J. RICARDO DE BORJA (H. DOC. NO. 1229).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. J. Ricardo de Borja, a citizen of Ecuador, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Ecuador.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Ecuador, and that it would follow established precedents.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

DANIEL M. FROST.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 33) for the relief of Daniel M. Frost, which was to strike out lines 8 to 12, inclusive.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN L. SEVY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 31) for the relief of John L. Sevy, which was, on page 2, line 6, after the word "of" where it first occurs to insert "a valid title to."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

COAST GUARD STATION IN LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4085) to establish a Coast Guard station on the coast of Louisiana, in the vicinity of Barataria Bay, which was, in lines 6 and 7, to strike out "and the station shall be manned during the entire year."

Mr. RANSDELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1741) for the relief of certain homestead entrymen for lands within the limits of the Glacier National Park, which were, on page 1, line 8, to strike out "an order" and insert "orders," and on page 1, line 9, after "twenty-first" insert "and twenty-fifth."

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO HOMESTEAD SETTLERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1066) authorizing leave of absence to homestead settlers upon unsurveyed lands, which was, on page 1, line 7, to strike out all after "a," down to and including "exceeding," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "leave of absence in one or two periods not exceeding in the aggregate."

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENTS FOR LANDS IN MYTON, UTAH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 35) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Myton, Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment and request a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

PATENTS FOR LANDS IN DUCHESNE, UTAH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 36) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments and request a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point reached when the bill was last under consideration is the amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads at page 6, line 3.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	James	Overman	Smoot
Brady	Jones	Page	Sterling
Brandegee	Kern	Ransdell	Thompson
Bryan	La Follette	Saulsbury	Tillman
Chamberlain	Lane	Shafroth	Townsend
Chilton	Lippitt	Sheppard	Underwood
Clark, Wyo.	McLean	Sherman	Vardaman
Dillingham	Myers	Shields	Walsh
Gallinger	Newlands	Simmons	Weeks
Harding	Oliver	Smith, Md.	Williams

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is necessarily absent from the Chamber on account of serious illness in his family.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TAGGART]. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN], who has been called from the city.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] are absent on official business, being on the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral of the late Senator from Maine, Mr. BURLEIGH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. No quorum is present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia and Mr. SMITH of Georgia entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request absent Senators to attend.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. STONE, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. FLETCHER entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that further proceedings under the call be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General," on page 6, line 3, after the word "That," to strike out "hereafter" and insert "for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1917, and thereafter"; in line 7, before the word "payments," to strike out "quarterly" and insert "semimonthly"; and, in line 12, after the word "adjustment," to strike out "And provided further, That the proviso at the end of section 252 of the Postal Laws and Regulations be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"'Provided, however, That this provision shall not apply to Towson, Md., or to Clayton, St. Louis County, Mo.'; and that the city of Cambridge, Mass., shall be established by the Postmaster General forthwith as a separate post office of the class to which the aggregate receipts of the four substations of the Boston postal district now located within the limits of said city of Cambridge, entitled it and with such substations as in his opinion the needs of said city may require," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of postmasters, $31,000,000: Provided, That for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1917, and thereafter the respective compensation of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, graded in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in semimonthly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster General from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof to the First Assistant Postmaster General, for the calendar year immediately preceding the adjustment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 5, before the words "at not exceeding $1,900 each," to strike out "sixteen" and insert "twenty"; in the same line, before the words "at not exceeding $1,800 each," to strike out "forty-five" and insert "fifty"; in line 6, before the words "at not exceeding $1,700 each," to strike out "ninety-five" and insert "one hundred"; in line 8, before the words "at not exceeding $1,600 each," to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "one hundred and sixty"; in line 9, before the words "at not exceeding $1,500 each," to strike out "one hundred and eighty" and insert "one hundred and seventy-five"; in line 10, before the words "at not exceeding $1,400 each," to strike out "one hundred and fifty" and insert "one hundred and ninety"; in line 13, before the words "at not exceeding $1,200 each," to strike out "five hundred and sixty" and insert "six hundred and sixty"; in line 15, before the words "at not exceeding $1,000 each," to strike out "three hundred" and insert "three hundred and thirty-eight," and in line 17, after the words "in all," to strike out "$3,200,000" and insert "$3,500,000," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, 5, at not exceeding $4,000 each; 42, at not exceeding $3,000 each; 10, at not exceeding $2,500 each; 5, at not exceeding $2,000 each; 20, at not exceeding $1,900 each; 50, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 100, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 160, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 175, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 190, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 350, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 660, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 525, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 338, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 130, at not exceeding $900 each; 100, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $3,500,000. And the appointment and assignment of assistant postmasters hereunder shall be so made during the fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than this sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 10, after the words "per annum," to insert:

Provided, That section 5 of the act approved August 24, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to include employees of first and second class post offices designated as "special clerks."

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama to explain the purpose of the amendment proposed by the committee on page 13.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The purpose of the amendment is to give these special employees the same privileges and the same status that the regular appointees have in that class of service. It is recommended by the department.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Alabama what class these special employees constitute. Is it a permanent class?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are expert distributors and other classes of employees of that character, drawing a salary of twelve, thirteen, or fifteen hundred dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Are they permanent or are they appointed for a special purpose?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are permanent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 13, line 21, after the word "appropriated," to insert "and to enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the act of March 2, 1907, classifying clerks and city letter carriers in first and second class post offices, he may hereafter exceed the number of clerks appropriated for for particular grades: Provided, That the number of clerks in the aggregate as herein authorized be not exceeded," so as to make the clause read:

In all, $47,900,000, and hereafter the appointment and assignment of clerks hereunder shall be so made during each fiscal year as not to involve a greater aggregate expenditure than the sum appropriated; and to enable the Postmaster General to carry out the provisions of the act of March 2, 1907, classifying clerks and city letter carriers in first and second class post offices, he may hereafter exceed the number of clerks appropriated for for particular grades: Provided, That the number of clerks in the aggregate as herein authorized be not exceeded.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 2, to strike out "For compensation to printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers, 22, at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each; 3 at $1,000 each and 28 at $900 each; in all, $62,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "For compensation to printers, 10 at not exceeding $1,500 each; to printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers, 12 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,100 each, 3 at $1,000 each, and 28 at $900 each; in all, $62,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out "$1,400,000" and insert "$1,512,000," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to watchmen, messengers, and laborers, 1,800, at $840 each; in all, $1,512,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 15, after "$1,160,000," to strike out "Provided, That hereafter the Postmaster General may enter into contracts for the conduct of such stations for a term not exceeding two years," so as to make the clause read:

For compensation to clerks in charge of contract stations, $1,160,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 18, after the words "clerk hire," to insert "and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay"; in line 21, after the words "post offices," to strike out "$1,800,000" and insert "$2,120,000"; in line 22, after the word "That," to insert "hereafter"; and on page 15, line 4, after the words "shall be," to strike out "all National and State holidays" and insert "New Year's Day (January 1); Washington's Birthday (February 22); Memorial Day (May 30); Independence Day (July 4); the first Monday in September, known as Labor Day; Christmas (December 25); and such other days as the President of the United States may set apart as fast or thanksgiving days," so as to make the clause read:

For temporary and auxiliary clerk hire and for substitute clerk hire for clerks and employees absent with pay at first and second class post offices and temporary and auxiliary clerk hire at summer and winter resort post offices, $2,120,000: Provided, That hereafter when the needs of the Postal Service require the employment on holidays of clerks in first and second class post offices and letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, the employees who are required and ordered to perform holiday work shall be allowed compensatory time on one of the 30 days following the holiday on which they perform such service: Provided, That for the purpose of this act holidays shall be New Year's Day (January 1); Washington's Birthday (February 22); Memorial Day (May 30); Independence Day (July 4); the first Monday in September, known as Labor Day; Christmas (December 25); and such other days as the President of the United States may set apart as fast or thanksgiving days.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 13, after the words "post offices," to strike out "$90,000" and insert "$130,000, of which $20,000 shall be immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For unusual conditions at post offices, $130,000, of which $20,000 shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 23, after "$1,900," to insert "And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, expend not exceeding $400,000 for the employment, at a maximum salary of $600 per annum, of assistant postmasters at post offices of the third class where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900 per annum," so as to make the clause read:

For allowances to third-class post offices to cover the cost of clerical services, $1,775,000: Provided, That no allowance in excess of $300 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200; nor in excess of $400 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,300, $1,400, or $1,500; and that no allowance in excess of $500 shall be made where the salary of the postmaster is $1,600 or $1,700; nor in excess of $800 where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in the disbursement of this appropriation, expend not exceeding $400,000 for the employment, at a maximum salary of $600 per annum, of assistant postmasters at post offices of the third class where the salary of the postmaster is $1,800 or $1,900 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 22, after the words "fifth grade," to insert "and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade"; in line 24, after the words "City Delivery Service," to strike out "$39,100,000," and insert "$39,116,700: Provided, That the marine letter carriers assigned to the Detroit River postal service shall be paid $1,500 per annum, and that the season of service for each year be a continuous one, lasting from the opening to the close of navigation," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of letter carriers at offices already established, including substitutes for letter carriers absent without pay, and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in first-class post offices from the fifth to the sixth grade and for the promotion of 75 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fourth to the fifth grade and for the promotion of 5 per cent of the letter carriers in second-class offices from the fifth to the sixth grade, City Delivery Service, $39,116,700: Provided, That the marine letter carriers assigned to the Detroit River postal service shall be paid $1,500 per annum, and that the season of service for each year be a continuous one, lasting from the opening to the close of navigation: Provided further, That hereafter there shall be no distinction in salary made between letter carriers assigned to collection duty and letter carriers assigned to delivery duty: And provided further, That letter carriers whose salaries have been reduced as the result of any order of the Post Office Department, making the maximum salary $1,000 to be paid letter carriers assigned to collection duty, shall be restored to their former grades.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 14, after the word "established," to strike out "$3,675,000," and insert "$4,100,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of substitutes for letter carriers absent with pay, and of auxiliary and temporary letter carriers at offices where city delivery is already established, $4,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 12, after the words "exceeding 10 years," to insert:

Provided further, That section 3944, Revised Statutes, is hereby amended by the elimination of the words "or the Second Assistant Postmaster General," and the act of May 17, 1878, is hereby amended by the substitution of the words "Postmaster General" for the words "Second Assistant Postmaster General" wherever they occur.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 20, after "$2,193,000," to insert:

Provided, That postmasters may be designated by the Postmaster General as disbursing officers for the payment of mail messengers and others engaged under their supervision in transporting the mails: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General postmasters and their employees may be permitted to perform mail messenger service, and allowances not in excess of $300 a year at any office may be made therefor from this appropriation.

So as to make the clause read:

For mail-messenger service, $2,193,000: Provided, That postmasters may be designated by the Postmaster General as disbursing officers for the payment of mail messengers and others engaged under their supervision in transporting the mails: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General postmasters and their employees may be permitted to perform mail-messenger service, and allowances not in excess of $300 a year at any office may be made therefor from this appropriation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment to come in on page 18, line 24, beginning with the proviso, to strike out down to and including the word "appropriation," on page 19, line 3, and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 24, after the word "mails," it is proposed to strike out the proviso reported by the committee ending with the word "appropriation," on page 19, line 3, and to insert:

Provided further, That, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at post offices of the third and fourth classes may enter into contracts for the performance of mail messenger services, and allowances may be made therefor from this appropriation: Provided further, That the total amount payable under such contract to any postmaster, assistant postmaster, or clerk shall not exceed $300 in any one year.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 19, line 5, after "$976,000," to insert "Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube mail service until June 30, 1917," so as to make the clause read:

For the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other similar devices, $976,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend existing contracts for pneumatic-tube mail service until June 30, 1917.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, let me ask the chairman of the committee to explain why that amendment is inserted. It would seem to be an instruction to the Postmaster General to continue that service whether he desired to do so or not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, under the law the contracts heretofore made by the Postmaster General and authorized by Congress will expire June 30. A provision came here from the other House making an appropriation for the payment of pneumatic-tube service for the next fiscal year. In the meantime the contracts existing and authorized expire on the 30th of June of this year. Some time ago—perhaps a year and a half ago; it has been so long that I can not exactly remember—a commission of so-called experts was appointed by the Postmaster General to investigate the question of pneumatic tubes, to determine as to their usefulness, and whether or not the contracts should be renewed or extended. That commission has not yet reported, and we are advised that perhaps they will not report before the last of July. In the meantime the contracts expire. The committee thought that it was but proper, right, and fair that these contracts be extended for 12 months, in order to prevent the immediate discontinuance of the service without giving an opportunity to the contractors or to anybody else to negotiate for a renewal of the service. That is the reason this provision was put into the bill.

The Senator from Florida, I think, is about correct when he states that we intended that this should be an instruction to the Postmaster General to extend these contracts for one year. It was in order to give Congress at its next session an opportunity to deal fairly and intelligently with this important branch of the service. When the committee of experts shall have reported in August or September or October or at some other time and recommend that a part of this service perhaps ought to be discontinued or that there ought to be perhaps an extension, then Congress will have that report, and we shall be able to deal intelligently with it during the next session. In the meantime the service will not be interrupted. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. BRYAN. I desire to ask the Senator whether or not the Postmaster General is opposed to continuing the contracts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, I can only say that the Postmaster General said to the pneumatic-tube people, "I will extend your contracts for six months without any legislation at all." He did issue an order that these contracts be extended for six months; but, as I have stated, in the meantime, at the expiration of six months, Congress will not be in session, or, if in session, will not have time to legislate on the question. That is the reason why we thought this legislation was wise and proper. Certainly it can work no very great hardship to extend these contracts for a year. We got that view from the fact that the other House itself sent over to us in their bill an appropriation sufficient to pay these contracts for an entire year, without any explanation or protest from anybody with reference to the appropriation.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Alabama what cities are affected by this legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The cities of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Chicago.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, one other question. I notice that the total appropriation is not changed at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. BRYAN. Then this legislation has nothing whatever to do with the appropriation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know what the Senator would call it. It is just simply an instruction to the Postmaster General to extend these contracts for a year at the same price which he is now paying.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, we make the appropriation with that limitation. We are not willing to appropriate the money unless the service is to be continued.

Mr. BRYAN. The appropriation is made irrespective of the language that follows in the proviso; the appropriation is complete without that.

I believe, really, that the proviso is subject to a point of order, but I do not know that I care to raise the point, in view of the explanation which has been made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I had supposed from what little information I had with reference to the matter that the Postmaster General did not desire to continue the contracts for pneumatic-tube service in the cities of Philadelphia and Boston, and that this was an effort upon the part of the committee to compel him to enter into such contracts. Of course, if he has already extended the contracts for six months, and is waiting on the report from the committee of experts, and if he could not extend the contracts beyond that time, after the expiration of the six months, that puts the matter in a different light. I had supposed, however, that this was simply an attempt to compel the entering into contracts which the department thought ought not to be entered into, the department believing that there was no excuse or reason for entering into the contracts and that the work could be better performed without the contracts. That is my information about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I understand that the Postmaster General is rather antagonistic to the pneumatic-tube service, and I think, if that is the case, it is because he is not conversant with conditions as they exist in our great cities, especially the congestion in the business portions. In New York particularly, as well as in Philadelphia, and especially in the city in which I live, it is almost impossible since the construction of many high buildings and the consequent going and coming of thousands where formerly there were only hundreds of people to get along the streets, and any system of transporting mail which will take traffic off the streets and put it under the streets ought not to be abandoned without the fullest kind of investigation. For that reason I believe that a careful investigation of this subject will not only lead to the continuance of the contracts now existing but to the establishment of this service or some similar service in other cities.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 19, line 14, after "$2,000,000," to strike out "Provided, That the full fee of 8 cents shall be paid to the special-delivery messenger employed by the Government," so as to make the clause read:

For fees to special-delivery messengers, $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, after line 19, to strike out:

That on and after July 1, 1916, when the total compensation of any postmaster at a post office of the fourth class for four consecutive quarters shall amount to $1,000, exclusive of commissions on money orders issued, and the receipts of such post office for the same period shall aggregate as much as $1,900, the Auditor for the Post Office Department shall so report to the Postmaster General, who shall, in pursuance of such report, assign such post office to its proper class, to become effective at the beginning of the next succeeding quarterly period, and fix the salary of the postmaster accordingly.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 9, after the words "Post Office Department," to insert "or to a post office designated by the Postmaster General," so as to make the clause read:

That section 3938 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"All letters of domestic origin which can not be delivered by postmasters shall be sent to the Post Office Department or to a post office designated by the Postmaster General and such as contain inclosures of value, other than correspondence, shall be recorded. If the sender or addressee can not be identified, such letters shall be held for a period of one year awaiting reclamation. If within one year they have not been claimed, they shall be disposed of as the Postmaster General may direct. All other undeliverable letters shall be disposed of without record and not held for reclamation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General," on page 21, line 2, after the words "power-boat routes," to insert "or by aeroplanes," so as to make the clause read:

For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes or by aeroplanes, $1,060,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 4, after "$59,185,000," to insert:

Provided, That every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$29,725,050," and insert "$28,825,050," and in line 18, after the word "capacity," to insert "Provided further, That the assignments of railway postal clerks of equal grade and record on any route shall be made upon a basis of line seniority, and that they shall be credited with full time when deadheading under orders of the department," so as to make the clause read:

Railway Mail Service: For 15 division superintendents, at $3,250 each; 2 assistant superintendents, at $2,350 each; 15 assistant division superintendents, at $2,250 each; 118 chief clerks, at not exceeding $2,100 each; 459 clerks, grade 10, at not exceeding $1,800 each; 1,886 clerks, grade 9, at not exceeding $1,700 each; 549 clerks, grade 8, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 7,876 clerks, grade 7, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 1,003 clerks, grade 6, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 1,892 clerks, grade 5, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 4,493 clerks, grade 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 926 clerks, grade 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 193 clerks, grade 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 3,496 clerks, grade 1, at not exceeding $900 each; in all, $28,825,050: Provided, That clerks assigned as clerks in charge of crews consisting of more than 1 clerk shall be clerks of grades 5 to 10, inclusive, and may be promoted one grade only after three years' satisfactory and faithful service in such capacity: Provided further, That the assignments of railway postal clerks of equal grade and record on any route shall be made upon a basis of line seniority and that they shall be credited with full time when deadheading under orders of the department.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Alabama as to the exact meaning of that proviso. There is a great deal of fault found on the part of railway postal clerks so far as their assignments are concerned. Is this provision intended to establish a principle upon which the assignments shall be made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I will say with reference to this amendment that this provision was inserted in the bill after several hearings accorded the postal clerks who are interested. We thought that they were about right and fair in what they contended should be done, and we inserted practically in this bill the language which they desired. There was no objection to it on the part of the Post Office Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. The language is "upon a basis of line seniority."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That means that seniority, if the record of the clerk is good, will be recognized?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it a very desirable provision, and I am glad it has been inserted in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 23, line 13, after the word "vacation," to strike out "$193,900" and insert "$893,900: Provided, That the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stat., 1105), be amended to read as follows: 'The Postmaster General may allow railway postal clerks an annual vacation of 15 days, with pay': And provided further, That the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., 798), be amended to read as follows: 'That hereafter the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may provide, allow any railway postal clerk leave of absence with pay for a period not exceeding 30 days, with the understanding that his duties will be performed without expense to the Government during the period for which leave is granted, he to provide a substitute at his own expense,'" so as to make the clause read:

For substitutes for clerks on vacation, $893,900: Provided, That the act of March 3, 1901 (31 Stats., p. 1105), be amended to read as follows: "The Postmaster General may allow railway postal clerks an annual vacation of 15 days, with pay": And provided further, That the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 798), be amended to read as follows: "That hereafter the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may provide, allow any railway postal clerk leave of absence with pay for a period not exceeding 30 days, with the understanding that his duties will be performed without expense to the Government during the period for which leave is granted, he to provide a substitute at his own expense."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 1, after the words "foreign mails," to strike out "$3,430,000," and insert "$3,800,000," so as to make the clause read:

For transportation of foreign mails, $3,800,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not exceeding $103,000, to cover the cost to the United States of maintaining sea post service on steamships conveying the mails, and not exceeding $79,100 for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in New York Bay to the steamship and railway piers, for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in San Francisco Bay to the piers, and for transporting the foreign mail from incoming steamships at Honolulu from quarantine to the piers; also for transferring the mail from steamships performing service under contract for transporting United States mail.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Postal Savings System," on page 30, line 18, after the words "labor-saving devices," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the purchase, repair, exchange, and maintenance of mechanical mail-handling apparatus and other labor-saving devices, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 4, after the words "And provided further," to strike out:

That no part of the money herein appropriated for rural delivery service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

And insert:

That rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

Hereafter all rural mail-delivery routes shall be divided into two classes, to be known as—

Standard horse-drawn vehicle routes, which shall be 24 miles in length, and

Standard motor-vehicle routes, which shall be 50 miles in length, and shall only be established upon certificate of the duly qualified county road officials that the character of the roads proposed to be used, as well as climatic conditions, will warrant regular and practically uninterrupted service throughout the year.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the establishment of horse-drawn vehicle routes of less length than the standard of 24 miles: Provided, That if in extraordinary cases, in order to render more complete service, it should be necessary to do so, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to increase the length of routes not to exceed 20 per cent above the standards herein prescribed: Provided further, That carriers in rural mail-delivery service shall furnish and maintain at their own expense all necessary vehicle equipment for prompt handling of the mail: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed, and no order shall be issued, to prevent the use of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow and pay additional compensation to rural letter carriers who are required to carry pouch mail to intermediate post offices or for intersecting loop routes in all cases where it appears that the carriage of such pouches increases the expense of the equipment required by the carrier or materially increases the amount of labor performed by him, such compensation not to exceed the sum of $12 per annum for each mile such carrier is required to carry such pouch or pouches.

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to reorganize and readjust existing rural mail-delivery service where necessary to conform to the standards herein prescribed: Provided, That in making appointments of rural carriers for service on new routes which may be created by the reorganization herein ordered preference shall be given to carriers who were formerly employed in rural delivery service and who were separated therefrom on or after June 30, 1915, by reason of any previous reorganization of the service and without charges against them: And provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations already made and still available and unexpended for rural free-delivery service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, to all letter carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, their executors or administrators, the difference between what they received for their said services and the amount that would have been paid to them in accordance with the proviso contained in joint resolution making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 4, 1915.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that, as a number of Senators who are vitally interested in the provisions respecting the Rural Delivery Service are absent, and as this provision affects all parts of the country, consideration of this section of the bill be deferred until to-morrow, when a larger number of Senators will be present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

Mr. KERN. A number of Senators are absent attending the funeral of Senator BURLEIGH, while others have been detained. I know that several of them desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I understand an amendment will be proposed by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], which will meet any objection which the Senator from Indiana or any other Member of the Senate may have to this provision, and I do not think, when the Senator hears the amendment, he will feel that the provision should go over. If he does, I am willing to let it go over. As I have suggested, the Senator from Montana has an amendment which I think will cure any objection which any Senator or anybody else has ever made.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 33, in line 3, it is proposed to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifty," and after the word "prescribed" to insert:

And in such cases the compensation of the carrier on such route shall be increased above the maximum pay heretofore fixed by law for rural carriers at the rate of $24 per annum for each mile of said routes in excess of 30 miles for horse-drawn vehicle routes, and any major fraction of a mile shall be counted as a mile.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the committee if that amendment is acceptable to him?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the committee, after reporting this bill, had their attention called to this provision, and, after very mature consideration of it, thought that the amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana was about what the law ought to be, and that it would certainly relieve the provision of any criticism that it interfered with any established route or any route that might be hereafter established. It will apply generally, and the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, when a route is established, will establish it in conformity with the law. I think the amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will simply say that the amendment to the amendment will overcome a very serious objection to the committee amendment which would arise in the mountain States and the partially settled States of the far West. With this amendment, however, to the committee amendment adopted, there will be no injustice resulting to those communities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, it will be observed that in the bill as it came from the House provision is made—

That no part of the money herein appropriated for rural delivery service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

In other words, that no route could be changed from a standard wagon route to a motor route unless a majority of the people living along the route asked the Post Office Department to do it, and that no matter what the demands of the service might be the Postmaster General would be prohibited from using that business prudence which ought to be expected of a man in a great department, and would be obliged to leave the conduct of the Government's business to a petition of people living along a rural route.

That was the House provision. The Senate committee proposes to strike that out and to substitute this sort of a plan: That there shall be horse-drawn vehicle routes and motor routes, but that no motor route shall be established except upon the certificate of the county road official, road supervisor, or county commissioner, or somebody in the county, that the character of the roads proposed to be used would justify the change, and also that the climatic conditions would justify it. You turn, then, from the petition of people living along the route to a road supervisor to dictate to this great Government where you can have a motor-vehicle route!

In this day, when good roads exist in some parts of this country, it is no hardship to require that a carrier shall cover 50 miles in a day. Mr. President, if we are going to ask the head of this department to extend the service as it ought to be extended, we ought to allow him latitude to do it in a businesslike way, as anybody else would do it.

Roads now are being covered by automobiles. Indeed, this provision provides that a standard wagon route may be covered by an automobile. It does not require a man to work very long in a day to cover 24 miles on a rural route. You are going to take away from Congress and to take away from the department the running of the department's business and turn it over to be run by petitions of men living along the routes, naturally willing to assist the rural carriers in any way they can, to sign petitions for them as they have signed petitions for the increase of their salaries from the amount paid one year to four and a half million dollars increase the next, basing it first upon one theory and then upon another, claiming that the parcel-post packages made it necessary for additional work to be done, leaving the discretion there, however, that it should not be exceeding so much money. When the Postmaster General exercised his right under that law and said that where no increase of work had been caused by reason of the establishment of this service additional pay would not be granted, and when the Post Office bill failed and a joint resolution had to be put in to take its place a year ago, the House of Representatives was not satisfied without having a provision put in there to establish standard routes and compel the Postmaster General to pay the full price; but there was then put in the bill, for the first time, a provision which these men then recognized as equitable and just, that he might combine routes where it could be done and make a motor route out of them.

That brought about this trouble. They are turning around now by general legislation to repeal the general legislation they put upon that joint resolution, because it has not been satisfactory to them; and why? Under it the Postmaster General has combined wagon routes into motor routes, and he has done his duty. He has served more people by it. Millions of people living in the country have been given the benefits of the delivery of the mails by reason of that service. I suppose every Senator has had protests against the establishment of motor routes. I have. In one county in my State, where the roads are as smooth as they are in this city, they protested against the combining of two 24-mile routes into one and dispensing with the services of one man and allowing the other one to have an automobile to carry the mails.

Mr. President, I am going to raise a point of order on this committee amendment. Before I do that, however, I want to call attention to one other thing that is involved here.

On page 34 a requirement is made that the Postmaster General shall go back and pay to the rural carriers the full amount of $1,200 which he might have paid to each carrier. I suppose there can be no doubt but that that part of this amendment is open to a point of order. I raised the point of order on it a year ago, and it was sustained.

Coming back to the text of the bill, Mr. President, what is it that the House provision does? It simply provides that the money appropriated shall not be used to cover any expense upon a motor-vehicle route unless a majority of the patrons of the route ask that it shall be done. What is done by the Senate amendment that strikes that out? It does several things. It changes the law. The House provision is simply a limitation upon the appropriation; but beginning with the language of the Senate committee, it is general legislation, establishing two systems—one a wagon route and the other a motor-vehicle route.

That is the first thing they do. Then they provide for the pay. If a route is extended beyond the standard route of 24 miles, under the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] they must be paid, if the mileage is in excess of 30 miles, $24 per annum per mile. Then some more general legislation that has nothing to do with the provision of the House bill is that the carriers may deliver the mail in automobiles on wagon routes, and that additional compensation may be paid by the Postmaster General. Then, again, it is provided that the Postmaster General is directed to reorganize and readjust the rural-mail deliveries in this country.

That is general legislation, Mr. President. The mere fact that the House bill had a provision limiting an appropriation does not justify or authorize, as against a point of order, general legislation such as is reported here by this committee.

I need not call the attention of the Chair to Rule XVI. In order that it may go in the RECORD, however, I call the attention of the Chair to the third paragraph:

> Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill—
> The House bill—
> be received which does not directly relate thereto.

This Senate amendment does not relate to the things to which the House bill relates.

As to the provision on page 34 to direct the Postmaster General to pay for rural free delivery, I rely upon the fourth paragraph of Rule XVI:

> No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation, which shall be cited on the face of the amendment.

It can not be said, Mr. President, that this is to carry out the provisions of an existing law. The Postmaster General acted within the terms of the statute when he made the payments to these people, and so that is nothing in the world but a private claim against the Government. If it be not comprehended within that objection, it is surely general legislation upon an appropriation bill.

I say therefore that the whole of the Senate amendment is general legislation. I apprehend nobody would dispute that. I suppose the contention of the advocates of this amendment will be that they have stricken out language of a House bill and substituted other language to take its place. But, Mr. President, they are not substituting language which relates to the same thing. The House language relates to maintaining a motor-vehicle route, or the establishment of one. The Senate amendment relates to the setting up of a system of motor-vehicle routes through legislation, and the two things are entirely different.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair interrupt the Senator from Florida at this point. Is there any law now on the statute books that has to do with motor-drawn vehicles?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes, sir; in the joint resolution of 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A general law that applies to motor routes?

Mr. BRYAN. It was in the joint resolution. The joint resolution of 1915 made provision for the pay, establishing standard routes, and the pay of so much, without allowing the language to remain at "not exceeding," as it had been theretofore, and then, in the concluding sentence—I wish I had it here—it provides in substance—> that the Postmaster General may establish motor routes, not exceeding 50 miles in length.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is quite certain that the point of order made by the Senator from Florida is unsound. It gave the most careful and the most deliberate and the most exhaustive consideration to this very question. Rule XVI is not applicable, as the committee believes, under the uniform, unbroken practice of the Senate, in cases where the House of Representatives by its action submits to the Senate a provision of law or a matter of appropriation which would, under the Senate rules, if it did not come from the House in that form, be subject to that rule. In other words, if the House of Representatives puts a provision in one of these bills on some subject, legislating or making an appropriation not estimated for by a department, then the vigor of the Senate rule can not apply to that matter embraced within the House provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What has the Senator from Georgia to say about the contention of the Senator from Florida that the provision of the House bill is nothing more nor less than a limitation upon the appropriation; that it is not legislation with reference to motor-drawn vehicles, but simply a limitation on the appropriation? What has the Senator from Georgia to say to that?

Mr. HARDWICK. I was coming to that a little later. I am laying down now, as the first premise, that if the House has legislated in connection with its bill, then the Senate undoubtedly must be at liberty to enact with respect to that matter such legislation as seems best to the Senate. Otherwise the Senate would be at a disadvantage. Otherwise the House would have greater power in shaping legislation than the Senate could possibly have.

While this provision of the House, the matter which we struck out and for which we substituted the provision against which the Senator from Florida makes the point of order, is in the shape of a limitation, it has in it no more of the language of limitation than has the provision of the Senate committee. Besides that, Mr. President, it seems to me that we have provided merely a substitute for a legislative proposition submitted by the House, because if we can deal with this question at all we can not be compelled to deal with it within the exact and precise limits laid down by the House or its committee, but we must deal with it subject only to the discretion of the Senate as to how far we shall or shall not go in dealing with the subject matter embraced in the House provision. In other words, Rule XVI has no application to the text of a House bill or to amendments to such text.

To illustrate what I mean, take the Senate and the House amendments, and undoubtedly we can take any cognate proposition that is a fair substitute for it and put it in. Now, how far the limits are up or down on that question is not a matter for the point of order to control, nor is it a matter for any presiding officer to determine. It is a matter for the discretion of the Senate to control on a legislative proposition.

Now let us see. The provision of the House was:

And provided further, That no part of the money herein appropriated for rural-delivery service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

The VICE PRESIDENT. How does that change the law?

Mr. HARDWICK. Under existing law—the law to which the Senator from Florida referred—the Postmaster General had authority to establish any motor route that he saw fit to establish that was not over 50 miles in length, without any such condition upon him as now made by the House of Representatives. Now, if the House of Representatives has the right to lay down a rule of that sort, certainly the Senate can not be held up just to say, "We will or we will not accept the proposal of the House." We have a right to substitute a proposal of our own for it. We have a right to say, "We will not let the Postmaster General establish these routes except upon some other condition that seems good to the Senate"; and that is what we have undertaken to do in this provision.

It can not be said that the power of the Senate is confined to agreeing or disagreeing, just as it is written, with the House provision. The Senate must have the power to substitute its own will and its own judgment for the provision of the House; and just so, developing that idea, Mr. President, it seems to me that any cognate proposition, any proposition involved in this matter, any proposition akin to it, any proposition which in the judgment of the Senate ought to be legislated upon in view of the House provision, which we can not get rid of by our rules, is subject to be legislated on by the Senate without respect to Rule XVI.

I am informed by Senators oldest in commission on both sides of this Chamber that such is the unbroken practice of the Senate, that where the House of Representatives—and, of course, the rules are different in the House of Representatives—undertakes to legislate on a matter it brings that matter before the Senate freed from the limitations and requirements of Rule XVI.

I had intended to answer at a later period, but I suppose I might as well do it now, the specific objection of the Senator to the provision on page 34:

And provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations already made—

I will ask the Vice President to notice the language—and still available and unexpended for Rural Free Delivery Service—

This is no private claim. It is an appropriation made for a public service, still unexpended, in the Public Treasury, to the credit of the Post Office Department, and to the credit of this branch of the Postal Service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make the suggestion, to carry out the original purpose and will of the Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. And, as my friend from Mississippi suggests, to carry out the original purpose, will, and intent of Congress in a law passed two years ago. There is no question of a private claim in it. There is no question of new law. Under the very express terms of the provision that we have drawn, we are simply trying to carry out the act of Congress passed two or three years ago and reappropriating money and requiring it to be spent. That money is not to be taken out of the general funds in the Treasury, but it is already in the Treasury to the credit of the Post Office Department and to the credit of this particular fund.

Mr. President, I do not know how the Senate will preserve its legislative equality, I do not know how the Senate can preserve its legislative independence if it is to be said that the House of Representatives can suggest one way, and only one way, of dealing with this question, which is violative of Rule XVI, I admit, which on its face and in terms violates one of the rules of the Senate, and that we, utterly unable to get rid of the House provision by any appeal to our rules, because the text of the House bill is not subject to our rules, have not full liberty to amend the proposition in any way and to any extent that the Senate thinks is right and proper and that a majority of the Senate favors. That is the theory on which the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads unanimously voted for this proposition and unanimously submitted it. The Senate has full liberty of action in respect to such a matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to my friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, is the Senator clear that the provision submitted by the Senate committee does not increase the appropriation contained in the bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Would not the amendment that was agreed to, submitted by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], increase it?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; because we make no additional appropriation for the service on account of it. If the Senator will pardon me, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana—I shall be glad to put it in; I ought to have put it in when we were considering that matter—involves an expenditure of only $81,000, by actual figures. The general appropriation for this service is ample to cover it. There is always margin enough in an appropriation as large as this to cover that, and we did not ask for a single dollar of extra appropriation when we agreed to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That appropriation of $81,000 comes out of the lump sum?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; out of the lump sum—out of the $59,000.000.

Mr. President, that is our case. On the merits of the Senator's motion there is much that can be said; and as soon as we get by this point of order, if the Chair holds with us, as I hope he will, I shall be glad to answer the Senator on the merits of the proposition. He has not made—and I am very fond of the Senator, too, as he knows—but, in my judgment, he has not made a single statement on that question that can not be easily and thoroughly refuted. I think I can demonstrate from my own personal knowledge of the administration of this service in the State of Georgia alone that none of the things that the Senator contends for is what has happened, and that the very reverse has happened, and that this provision that we propose to control the discretion of the Post Office Department is wise, good business, and good common sense; that it is better than the provision of the House of Representatives, which merely provided for a vote of the patrons to be served; that it proposes to leave the question of the suitability of the roads and of climatic conditions to those authorities intrusted in each locality with the duty of constructing and maintaining those roads; and that there is no wiser way in which the question of fact which lies at the bottom of these cases can be determined than in the way suggested by your committee.

We believe, Mr. President, that the entire provision is in order, because the House of Representatives undertook to deal with this question, and when they undertook to deal with it the Senate must deal with it in perfect freedom to deal with it as the Senate thinks best.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The difficulty with the ruling on the part of the Chair is a difficulty of fact and not one of law, and it arises in the disputed statement of fact between the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Georgia.

The Chair has no doubt that Rule XVI, with reference to general legislation upon an appropriation bill, does not apply where the House puts general legislation in the bill. The Chair believes that when the House enters into that field the Senate has a right to pursue the field. But here is a disputed question of fact between the two Senators about which the Chair knows nothing and has no way of ascertaining, as far as the Chair can see.

The Senator from Florida is insisting that the House provision is nothing in the world save a limitation upon the expenditure of money provided by the bill for rural free service, in that it provides that the money shall not be expended upon a motor-vehicle route

"until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route." The Senator from Florida is evidently construing that language with reference to motor-vehicle routes now in existence, and therefore the limitation, if it applies to a state of facts such as that, is simply a limitation upon the appropriation. On the other hand, the Senator from Georgia is manifestly construing it to apply not only to all motor-vehicle routes now in existence but also to all that may hereafter be established by the Post Office Department.

If this provision does apply to all motor-vehicle routes to be hereafter established by the Post Office Department, then, in the opinion of the Chair, the Senator from Georgia is right, and the Senate has the right to legislate upon the question. On the other hand, if it applies only to those motor-vehicle routes that are now in existence, then clearly it is only a limitation upon the appropriation, and the point of order to the amendment should be sustained.

The Chair, not being able to settle that question of fact, will submit the point of order to the Senate. The Chair does not know what is meant by the language of the House. The Senators do not agree as to what it means.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the form of motion submitted to the Senate? Is it the question, Shall the point of order be sustained?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; shall the point of order be sustained? There is a clear conflict as to what this House provision means. It may mean either of two things: It may apply only to the present motor-vehicle routes or it may apply to those that are to be established hereafter. If it applies to those to be established hereafter, the amendment is in order. If it applies only to the routes now in existence, it is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Florida to say that the proviso simply applies to routes already in existence? That clearly was not the intention of the House. It means that hereafter no 50-mile route shall be established until the question is submitted to the patrons on the route. It is not alone the question as to routes already established. Nobody proposed to changed those. With the House it was principally a question as to routes hereafter to be established; and it provided that no route should be established until a majority of the patrons had signified their willingness to have it.

It seems to me that the point of order should be denied on other grounds. If that, however, is the sole contention of the Senator from Florida, the language of the House provision itself must convince anyone that it must apply to routes to be established hereafter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the language. The language is that it shall not be "used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route," and that is just a question as to whether it applies to those now in existence or is intended to cover future routes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the matter has to be submitted to the Senate and there is a larger attendance I believe I will restate my proposition.

There was no provision for motor-vehicle routes at all until the appropriation in the joint resolution of March 4, 1915. That joint resolution simply continued the appropriation of previous years, but a section was added to require the Postmaster General to pay $1,200 to the rural carrier for service on standard routes. Theretofore he had the discretion of paying not exceeding the annual salary stated. The joint resolution contains this proviso:

Provided, That in the discretion of the Postmaster General the pay of carriers who furnish and maintain their own motor vehicles and who serve routes not less than 50 miles in length may be fixed at not exceeding $1,800 per annum.

That is the only law there is about it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield for a question right here, that authorizes him to establish any sort of a new route.

Mr. BRYAN. Not exceeding 50 miles.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not exceeding 50 miles in length and to pay anything he chose not exceeding $1,800 a year. That is the exact status.

Mr. BRYAN. Now, the House puts in a provision that he can not establish a motor-vehicle route unless the majority of the citizens living on the route petition him to do it. That is their proposition. The Senate committee strikes that out and begins to make general legislation as to two different kinds of routes, one a wagon route and the other a motor route.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida now admit that the provision applies to the establishment of motor-vehicle routes in the future?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I think it applies to any that are now established or that might be established, but I am afraid the Chair has not caught the point I tried to make, and that is that this language in the House bill is a part of the House bill, and paragraph 3 of Rule XVI says:

Nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received.

I say it is not germane, but whether you are going to allow us to have an election by patrons upon the rural route as to whether one motor route shall be established or not, it is not germane to the question whether you are going to pay back some three or four million dollars to rural carriers, it is not germane to the question whether you are going to establish wagon routes and motor routes in this country. It is not germane to the question whether when one is over 30 miles long you are going to pay $24 per annum per mile. It is not germane to the question whether you are going to pay when they loop routes, as they call them, an addition of $12 per mile per annum. That is general legislation. It has nothing whatever to do with the limitation upon this appropriation that the House sought to place upon it.

The House wanted to stop the Postmaster General from using any of this money for combined routes. I think it is perfectly fair to say that they also wanted to stop him from combining any more rural routes.

But I call the particular attention of the Chair to the provision of paragraph 3. The Senator from Georgia says the Senate will be helpless and that the House would have more power than we.

Have we not the power now to strike out the House provision and stop? The House and the Senate are both limited by their rules. The rules of the Senate provide that no general legislation shall be placed upon an appropriation bill. If the House places general legislation upon an appropriation bill we have as much power to strike it out as it had to put it on. That is a complete answer to that contention.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, do I understand him to say that the Senate can not put in a substitute proposition?

Mr. BRYAN. Unless the Senate wanted to do away with its rules any Senator can rise here and stop that. Now, let us look at this for just a minute, Mr. President. This is an important question. An attempt is being made to cripple a great department, the department that comes into daily contact with all the people of the country. If it is successful the Postmaster General can not establish a motor route where conditions justify it unless a road supervisor or a county commissioner or a board of county commissioners approve the action of the Post Office Department.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BRYAN. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The learned and patriotic Senator states that it is the purpose of the committee, or rather the effect of this amendment will be, to cripple the Post Office Department or handicap it in its efforts or desire to serve the people. The able Senator's conclusion is unwarranted by the facts. It strikes me that the road commissioners are more nearly related to and very much more interested in the mail service—the accommodation of their friends and neighbors—than the officers in the Post Office Department at Washington could possibly be.

Now, as to the influences that may operate upon the road commissioners, who are required by the terms of this bill to make certificate as to the character of the roads, I think the able Senator from Florida might reasonably indulge the presumption that such commissioners are quite as patriotic and as much interested or devoted to the public interests and the extension of the Rural Mail Service as the gentlemen who occupy places in the Post Office Department. My observation since I came to Washington convinces me that there is no divinity "that hedges about" the average public servant in this city which renders him altogether exempt from error. While comparisons may be both "odorous" and "odious," I am going to venture the suggestion that I would rather trust the road commissioner to take care of the interest of his neighbor in the matter under discussion than the post-office inspector or the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. BRYAN. I am much obliged to the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, at this point I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question. He is complaining that the provisions of the bill require the road authorities to certify the condition of the road, whether or not the condition is such that rural service by automobiles may be continuously operated. I ask the Senator from Florida if he does not think that the road authorities of any county in his State or in any other State are more competent to judge of that question than the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who sits at his table in Washington and takes a map of Florida or Georgia and say, "Here are two routes 24 miles long; we will consolidate them into one and put on an automobile and save the pay of one carrier?" That is all right; it is proper economy; but the fact remains, and we all know it, as to large sections of the country, that on these roads automobiles can not go at all for a large part of the year, and there is no certainty whatever that they can go at any time of the year when there are rains and mud, as is the case very often.

That is the whole question. I think that the road supervisors and the road authorities who are authorized in the different States to pass upon this question are better competent to judge whether or not automobiles can be run to carry the mails to the people regularly, as they are expected to do. I ask the Senator which is the most competent to do that?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I am much obliged to my friends from Mississippi and Alabama both for helping me out on this amendment. I say, Mr. President, that we ought not to place it in the power of a road supervisor to say when the Post Office Department shall establish a motor-vehicle route. All the rural carriers prefer two routes, with the natural inclination they have to hold their jobs, and it is about as easy a proposition as you can get to have men sign petitions for them to hold it and to increase their pay. I know where two were combined and the population rose up to protest against it, when there was no difficulty to serve the two routes by making one motor route.

That was in the mind of the House when they provided that that could not be done unless a majority of the people along the route asked that it be done. That system has been done away with. I say that a majority of the people being served ought not to control the Post Office Department in carrying out a business proposition.

Likewise I say, Mr. President, that it ought not to be left in the hands of a road supervisor or a county commissioner to determine as to whether or not the great Government of the United States should establish a motor rural route.

That step shows, sir, that this amendment is not germane, that it is not relevant, to the provision of the House bill. The House in that provision was trying to stop an appropriation by not allowing the use of money, and that would stop it. You can not use any of this appropriation on motor routes if you establish any more of them unless a majority of the patrons say you can. That is all they were trying to do.

Now, what is the Senate committee trying to do? Here we are going to set up a wagon-route system and a motor-route system. You can have your wagon route, but you can not have your motor route unless the road officials certify that the character of the road is all right and that climatic conditions are all right.

Mr. GORE. The Weather Bureau?

Mr. BRYAN. No; the Weather Bureau would not have anything to do with it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I am not going to yield now. I have yielded for two speeches and I am going to continue. No; they would not depend on the Weather Bureau. It would be too unreliable. You are going to turn the whole thing over to the road supervisor to state what, in his judgment, ought to be done with the carriage of the mails of this country. That is what you are going to do; and then, if you go over 30 miles, they are putting in general legislation here that is bound to cost money.

The Senator from Georgia says that this appropriation need not be raised. It is well for the Senate to understand that there is involved in the last part of the Senate committee amendment an appropriation of about a million and a half dollars. Oh, it is said that is already provided for. If so, you do not need any legislation. The very reason why it is put in this bill is because the Postmaster General was within his rights under the law when he refused to make the payment. It was attempted last year and failed. Now, the proposition is submitted to the Senate on the point of order. I contend that it is not germane, that it is not relevant to the language in the House bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Let me raise a parliamentary inquiry before I take my seat. If I am at liberty to do so I should like to divide the point of order so as not to include within the first point the proviso beginning on line 5, page 34. I think I have a right to do that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been listening to the Senator from Florida. The Chair was in error in submitting the question to the Senate as being general legislation. The point now made by the Senator from Florida is that the amendment is not germane or relevant, and that is a question that the Senate must settle, with which the Chair has never had anything to do. So the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the Senator from Florida can submit either all or a part of the amendment to the Senate for a determination as to whether it is or is not relevant to the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. I will ask the Chair, then, if he will submit——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit down to——

Mr. BRYAN. Line 5, page 34.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Down to line 5, page 34, the question as to whether the amendment is germane and relevant.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not clear about the form, but I think the question would be, Is the point of order well taken?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not what the rule says. All questions of relevancy must be submitted. I studied the dictionaries for a long while after I came here to find out the difference between "germane" and "relevant," but I never could find any.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know either, so I made it on both grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I think they are the same, and therefore the language is tautological. The Chair is not criticizing the distinguished ancestors who prepared the rules, but "germane" and "relevant" mean the same thing, and when that question is raised all questions of relevancy of amendments under the rule shall be submitted to the Senate and be decided without debate. That is another part of it. I think the question is, Is the point of order well taken that the portion of the amendment beginning on line 9, page 32, and extending to page 34, line 5, is not relevant to the bill? It the point of order well taken that it is not germane and is irrelevant?

Mr. BRYAN. Those who think the point of order is well taken will vote "aye."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those who think it is not relevant will vote "aye," and those who think it is will vote "no."

Mr. BRYAN. Those who think the point of order is well taken will vote aye.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it means that it is not relevant.

Mr. BRYAN. That the point of order is sustained?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I did not want at this juncture to discuss the merits of this proposition, but the Senator from Florida has forced that discussion now.

Mr. President, this is not an effort to cripple a great department of the Government, but, on the contrary, it is an effort to keep a department of the Government from absolutely crippling and ruining a great department of the public service. I think I can demonstrate to those of my colleagues who will give me their attention that I am not stating the matter carelessly when I put it in these words.

The House of Representatives passed a provision which we struck out, which provides that hereafter the Postmaster General shall not be permitted to establish motor routes 50 miles in length except upon the petition of a majority of the patrons who are to be served.

There must have been a reason for that. It was put in on the floor of the House of Representatives. Of course it was not recommended by the department and it was not recommended by the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but the representatives of the American people after a debate of the question representing, I believe, the sentiment of this country passed this provision, because they knew that something was necessary if this great branch of the public service was to be preserved in all its usefulness for those of our citizens residing in the rural sections.

What is happening? I am sorry the Senator from Florida is not present. In States like Georgia, in many other States of this Union, consolidations of rural routes were effected absolutely without the slightest inspection. Not an inspector of the Post Office Department in many cases was sent or could be procured even by entreaty from this most august and arbitrary officer of the Federal Government. On the contrary, it seems that there was so much wisdom residing down here that these wise gentlemen could sit around a table and take the map of your State and mine prepared by men who had never seen the roads and determine whether or not motor vehicles could be used practicably on those routes and whether existing routes could be combined to make those motor routes.

Now, I do not know how it appeals to the Senator from Florida; I do not know how much his State has suffered from it, but I will tell you now no man who ever lived has sense enough and wisdom enough to sit down at a table and with a map as his sole guide and his sole informant, except it may be the general report of a postmaster that the roads are good, and without any inspection of the roads determine whether these motor routes are practicable or impracticable.

I remember case after case in our State where both the Senators and the Member of Congress from that district would appeal to these august gentlemen "at least do not put in these routes until you have sent an inspector down and let him ride over the roads, and see whether they will authorize and maintain this service," but in most cases the answer came back, "No; we have asked the postmasters about this question, and they say, many of them, that the roads are good in a general way," and in an equally general way many of them tried to take it back afterwards. "We are going to put them in." What is the result? They soon had to abandon many of them. They soon began to yield and to send inspectors, and in nine cases out of ten the inspectors went down with the case prejudged, knowing that the department's policy was to establish these routes, and knowing that they were expected to make a favorable report wherever it was possible.

That sort of service is not satisfactory; it is not the service the people of the United States are entitled to have. It is wrong. The result was that in our State, where they put in several hundred of these motor routes—I will not undertake to say from memory exactly how many—they had to abandon more than half of them in 12 months after they established them.

What does it prove? It proves that the Post Office Department alone, without some sort of advice from somebody, does not know the facts sufficiently well to determine whether or not these motor routes ought to be established.

Now, I am going to agree with the Senator from Florida in his proposition that the motor routes are coming and are desirable in many cases. Given proper conditions, given proper roads over which they can be used, given favorable circumstances, they will come, and they ought to come. The motor is the great vehicle of progress. It has come to stay to city folks and among our farmers. It has come into the rural sections of this country and it is going to be even more generally used as the public highways are improved and permit their operation throughout the country. These motor routes are all right, provided they are discriminately located, but they are all wrong, and the worst of wrong in the world, if they are carelessly or foolishly or indiscriminately located. They will work all right on good roads, but they do not work at all on bad ones.

Now, some of us here know how poorly the Post Office Department was administering this particular matter. The House of Representatives knew it, and by a strong majority vote on the floor they ran over their committee and the department and everybody else and put in this provision.

When the Senate committee came to consider it, it did not believe that was the wisest way to do it. The committee did not believe the plan of the House was the wisest plan to adopt. The committee realized that there was great force in some of the things the Senator from Florida has stated here to-day. For instance, the Senator said the popular rural carriers might prevent the people of the route from agreeing to a consolidation, even in a case where the roads and the climate were such as to authorize and justify and even require such a consolidation. We did not think it was right to leave it to a vote, but we did state that there ought to be some other way to determine the facts in the case, that there ought to be some other way to determine whether or not the roads were in such a condition and the climatic conditions were such that these routes could be successfully operated rather than to have it done by men sitting here in the departmental office, at their desks, with maps before them and with a few general questions that they had asked of the postmasters about the condition of the roads.

Postmaster after postmaster in my State stated that the roads were good practically all the year round, and would support automobile traffic the year round, and when they undertook to explain it—yes; they will support automobile traffic on a route 20 miles long, or it may be 30 miles long, but not on one 50 miles long with any degree of regularity. The department, in framing the questions to the postmasters of the country, did not ask, Are your roads sufficiently good to support automobile routes 50 miles in length practically throughout the year? They asked the question so generally that the postmasters replied that the roads are pretty good in their section; and then the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General took that as authority for the proposition that they are sufficiently good to establish and maintain motor routes 50 miles long, to be operated practically throughout the year. That is what happened.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if he or the committee have made any estimate as to the cost of the establishment of the rural mail delivery provided for in this amendment?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. It reads in this way:

> That rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

It seems to me that that is a very broad statement; and, if it is put into effect in good faith as it is worded here, it will cost an untold amount of money.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. I ought to have covered that already. It is only the expression of a general policy at which we are aiming. We did not undertake to increase the amount involved in this appropriation; but what we were after was to say to the department and to say to the country that it is not our policy to skimp this particular branch of the service, to try to save money on it, so as to make up a loss somewhere else; but we wanted them to know that the goal we were striving for was a general service to all the rural people of the United States. That is a mere statement of policy; it is nothing else except that; we wanted the department to know that its own administration ought to be shaped so as to concur and accord with the policy of the legislative branch of the Government. That was all. It can have no more effect than merely to state a policy, because it is merely a general statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, supposing the Postmaster General taking the law—if it should become a law—literally, how would he discriminate as to where these routes should be established and where they should not be established?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will answer the Senator from Utah frankly by saying that, of course, the Postmaster General could not discriminate; that he must treat every section of the country fairly; that he must treat all sections of the Republic alike; and I take it that he will do so. He can use only every dollar that we give him, and, of course, he can spend no more.

Mr. SMOOT. That was going to be my next question.

Mr. HARDWICK. He is limited, of course, so far as practical efforts go, to the amount of money we give him for this purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be a good answer if the Postmaster General should live strictly within the law and spend no more money than was appropriated; but my experience has been, where the head of a department is pressed by Representatives and is pressed by Senators with applications from different parts of the country for the establishment of rural routes, or by any other agency of the Government, that he yields here a little and there a little; and that before the close of the fiscal year we are asked to make up a deficiency. I rather think it more than likely that that would be the result in a case like this.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I will yield if the Senator from Mississippi wishes to answer the question propounded by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the honorable Senator from Utah if he does not subscribe absolutely to that declaration of policy?

Mr. SMOOT. I will answer the Senator from Mississippi in this way: I would not want to subscribe to it until I knew, at least approximately, what it was going to cost. I will say to the Senator that this policy—if it can be called a policy—or plan is ideal, I think, in its provisions. I think that the Senator and every other Senator would feel that where the mail could be delivered to serve, I should say, the entire rural population of the United States, it would be ideal in character.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, that ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. And I will say to the Senator, it should be extended as fast as the revenues of the Postal System will provide for it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is exactly what the bill provides.

Mr. SMOOT. But I can not see that there is any limitation on this provision.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is a limitation by the amount of money appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. No; if this becomes a law, it is virtually a demand, it seems to me, that any Postmaster General would feel impelled to extend these rural systems to the entire rural population of the United States just as fast as it is possible to do so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Postmaster General is compelled to do that now in the performance of the duty of his office, and is limited in the extension of the service only by the appropriation that is made for that purpose.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in addition to that I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to the provision of the act approved February 22, 1906, which provides that—

No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year.

And so on. I am aware that that act has sometimes been violated; but if the Senator from Utah will look up the facts with reference to this particular service I think he will find that the tendency has never been to violate it with reference to the Rural Delivery Service. Recently it has been the very reverse. There has always been an unexpended balance of this fund. We wanted to put this language into the law to inform the Post Office Department that it was our policy that there should not be an unexpended balance from this fund; that every dollar we appropriated ought to be used for the establishment and for the extension of these rural routes, because we were trying to give rural delivery service practically to the entire rural population of the United States. The fact that there have been such unexpended balances is one of the reasons why we have used this language.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am quite aware of the law which has just been quoted by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can give to the Senator from Utah the amount of these unexpended balances year after year if he desires me to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite aware of the existence of the law quoted by the Senator from Georgia; but I will say it is a law which has been "more honored in the breach than the observance."

Mr. HARDWICK. I am not going to argue with the Senator from Utah about that; but in this particular department, in reference to this particular service, that has never been true.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked that up, and I will take the Senator's word for it.

Mr. HARDWICK. What we meant by this language, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, was to say to the department, "Here we will give you, say, $59,000,000 in round sum; we do not want you to skimp this service; we do not want you to be saving something out of it; we want you to spend every dollar of it to extend, to improve, and to maintain the service which is so important to the rural population of the United States." That is why we inserted that language. I call the attention of the Senator to the suggestion of my associate on the committee that there is a four-million-dollar unexpended balance in this fund from last year. Another unexpended balance is a million and a half of what we appropriated under the act of 1913, which is still in the Treasury unexpended. We want the Post Office Department to know that we do not mean it to skimp this service or to economize to the extent of endangering or imperiling the efficiency of the service in the Rural Free Delivery System; that we do mean for them to spend the money which we appropriate for it, and in the way we appropriate it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite satisfied that the Postmaster General will go just as far as Congress will allow him to go. What I am afraid of is that he will go farther under this provision, for it is an invitation to the Postmaster General to extend the service beyond the bounds of actual reason. He may, however, not do so. The only object I had in rising was to learn whether or not the committee had considered this matter carefully and had any idea to give to the Senate as to what the actual cost of the provision, if carried into law, would amount to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah this question: Should not this language be construed in the light of what has been the course and what is now the course of the Post Office Department? Is it not a reply to what has been a manifest purpose of the Post Office Department in certain sections to cut this service? I will say that, as to my State, I felt perhaps they pursued the policy because the State was overwhelmingly Democratic and they thought the cutting off would not do any special harm, or at least would be stood there better than elsewhere.

Mr. SMOOT. No. The Senator from Georgia is wrong there, because that was done in other States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The manner in which they have torn to pieces the rural service in my State and cut it off has been something intolerable. When I complained they said, "Well, we have saved so much. Where do you want it spent?" I said, "Put back the routes you have improperly broken up."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sympathize entirely with what the Senator from Georgia has just said, but I am afraid that if this language is used the Postmaster General will take it as a direction to him that not only must he not stop within the appropriation, but that he must go on and extend this service to the rural population of the United States, irrespective of the cost.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose we add "not to exceed the appropriation"?

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that we will have to do something here.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think that will be the result. This is a mere expression of the policy of Congress with respect to this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to wait and hear what the Senator from Georgia has to say about the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Postmaster General can not expend any more than is appropriated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair interrupt? The Chair has listened to the discussion of this question upon the theory that the point of order was one which the Chair was to decide as to whether or not the provision is general legislation. There is no such point of order, as is now disclosed. It is a question for the Senate to determine under its rule as to whether or not this is relevant. That question must be decided without debate. Why debate the merits of this whole proposition until the Senate determines whether or not it is relevant?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am willing to vote on the proposition, and to vote now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator who made the point of order that he withdraw it—temporarily, at least? I want to hear the question discussed. I will, however, say to the Senator now that if the point of order is insisted upon I shall vote against sustaining the point of order, because I think the legislation is relevant; but I should like to hear the question discussed on its merits. Therefore I will ask the Senator if he will not withdraw the point of order—temporarily, at least?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, inasmuch as the matter is submitted to the Senate, if the Chair was correct in submitting it to the Senate, and the Senate can vote it down if it wants to do so, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. That relieves that part of the situation, and I will go on with the presentation of the committee's case on this subject. I understand that the point of order is withdrawn and that we are discussing the paragraph which is now before the Senate. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana was agreed to. Therefore the amendment proposed by the committee, as amended by the Senator from Montana, is the pending question, as I understand.

Now, let us proceed for just a moment. I realize the force of the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the committee labored with that quite a while, but we thought, as every one of us believed, that one of the most important things that this Government could do was to extend the Rural Delivery Service as soon as possible throughout the rural sections of this Republic, everywhere to all the people; that it was not a bad idea to put a general statement of that purpose into the law. The Postmaster General could not misunderstand it. This debate would inform him, if nothing else did—but he could not misunderstand it—because, although that is our policy, we have only been able to appropriate $59,000,000 for the purpose this year, although we hope to do better next year; or, if the party of the Senator from Utah should happen to be in power then, I hope they will do better. Whatever party is in power ought never to forget that this service is the most important and necessary service the rural people of America receive, and it ought never to be skimped or starved. On the contrary, it should be steadily and constantly improved and increased, and efficiency should be its first and most important consideration.

Now, Mr. President, I do not want to argue this matter at great length, but I do want to answer some other suggestions. In the first place, I say we agreed in part to the proposition laid down by the Senator from Florida. We thought that it was not right to leave this question of the establishment of motor routes entirely to a vote of the people to be served, because we realized that popular rural-route carriers, even in cases where the establishment of this service would be proper and a good business proposition, might be able to defeat the proposal. Therefore, what? Can we leave it to a department that must have local information and that will not accept the most reliable and trustworthy local information that can be given to them throughout this country; that must have information on a question of fact, and that will not accept information on that question of fact unless it happens to coincide with their preconceived notions about the thing? Can we leave it to people who think they have sense enough to sit down at a desk and with a map readjust the routes and say whether or not a motor route can be worked practically? Can we leave it to people who insist on basing their actions on the advice of postmasters, who are asked only the most general questions and who reply only in the most general way, and many of whom rush to the Post Office Department to volunteer a correction of their statements when they understand the purpose for which those statements are being used? I think not.

The House of Representatives thought not, by an overwhelming vote, and we thought not, with absolute unanimity, in the committee. To whom, then, should it be left? What better authority can you have on that question than the road authorities of each county, of each local road division even, if necessary, throughout this country?

Gentlemen say, Oh, what a shame it is to have this great Federal Government go to the local road authorities for permission to use or to establish a certain kind of postal service. It is not that at all. I utterly repudiate that idea, Mr. President. I know of no rule by which Federal authority ought to be exalted at the expense of State authority. I know of no reason why people who live back in the counties of a State are not just as good, just as honest, and just as reliable as Federal inspectors. I myself believe they are. I think they are just as good; and I am going to tell you another thing, I think they are just a little better. That is the way I look at it. There is not a county road board in my State whose judgment I would swap for that of any inspector who ever left the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General's office.

Now, let us see, Mr. President, what other considerations there are. Are the Federal inspectors elected by the people? No. They are not responsible to anybody, except some little bureau chief who appoints them and possibly promotes them according to the way they report. They are not responsible to the people; but, on the other hand, the road authorities of every county in this Republic are responsible to the people. They derive their power from the consent of the people. They must go to the people first for election and then for reelection. They have every motive to deal squarely and justly with the people who honor them and trust them, and I say to you that there is not a county road board anywhere in my State, and I do not believe that there is one anywhere in this Republic, that would purposely do wrong about this thing. They are charged by the people whom they serve with duties and responsibilities. They must construct and maintain the roads; and they know better than anybody else what is the condition of the roads; and is it, forsooth, an abasement of Federal authority to say that, instead of writing to a postmaster for information, the department shall write down to the road authorities who construct the roads and keep them up, so that they may find out what is the condition of those roads before they undertake to inaugurate this service? And yet Senators who make this objection forget that we are proposing to trust these selfsame local authorities with the expenditure of many millions of dollars to construct and maintain these selfsame roads in our good-roads bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know how it may be in the Senator's State, but in the New England States we have a State official who has charge of the roads. One of these routes will go through what we call towns and what in the West are called townships. In some cases such a route will go through three or four townships; and will it be necessary to get the consent of the local road officials in each one of those towns or townships before the route can be established?

Mr. HARDWICK. None of these routes, if the Senator please, I apprehend could go through more than two counties.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know of one instance in my State where such a route goes through three.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, you have splendid roads in that section of the country; and, furthermore, it would not be hard to get concurrent action on the part of three counties if the road is all right. There will not be a bit of difficulty about it if the road is all right.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not referring to counties, but to towns and townships.

Mr. HARDWICK. The county authorities are referred to in the provision. If the Senator's local situation requires any modification of that provision, the committee has no pride of opinion about it, and is ready to accept any modification that the local conditions in any State seem to require; but we believed it was best, taking the Republic as a whole, to constitute the county road officials as the judges of the character of the roads, because most of the routes are included within one county.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too, and I think that might well be specified.

Mr. HARDWICK. The provision does say "county road officials."

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg pardon; I did not realize that.

Now, if the Senator from Georgia will permit one further suggestion, he called attention to the disruption in his State of the Rural Delivery Service and suggested that it might be that the administration was sure that Georgia was a Democratic State.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Georgia] said that, although I heartily approve of his suggestion.

Mr. GALLINGER. And that the administration could do pretty much anything to Georgia and it would still remain loyal.

Mr. HARDWICK. And it will, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say that the destruction is universal. I have been deluged with appeals and protests from my own State and from some other New England States that the administration of the Rural Delivery Service was absolutely indefensible; and while I have no disposition to unduly criticize an administration which is not of my own party—I never have done that—I do think that there is great justification for some action on the part of Congress that will remedy the evil that exists and that seems to be increasing. For that reason I am very strongly inclined to support the Senate committee amendment to this bill, believing that if it is not absolutely right as written the conference committee will put it in shape, so that we will have a better service and a closer adherence to the mandate of Congress than we are having at the present time. The money appropriated for the rural service ought to be used; there is no question about that; and I have great sympathy with the suggestion that as fast as we can safely do so this service ought to be extended so as to serve substantially all the inhabitants of the rural districts. Of course we can not do it at once, but the purpose is a substantial and proper one.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the suggestion; and let me say to my associates on this side—to Democratic Senators—while the Democratic members of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads have endeavored to act in an absolutely nonpartisan way about a question so essentially nonpartisan as this great question of rural mail delivery, as I know our Republican associates on the committee will readily concede——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I wish to state that the predecessor of the present Postmaster General was not entirely free from criticism along some of the same lines.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; and Senators on this side believe that they can render their party no more valuable service, no more necessary service just at this juncture, than to attempt to correct some of the things about which there is such universal complaint throughout this country. First, we want to serve our country; we want to act as Senators of the United States without regard to partisan politics in supplying a great service of the Government; but I will admit that as a Democrat I believe it is absolutely necessary that legislation of the character we suggest be adopted; and I want to tell my friend from Florida that if my State was not as certainly Democratic as it is—a fact to which my colleague referred and to which I refer with pride—the conduct of the Post Office Department in that State would have lost it to the Democratic Party, and, as it is, it may cost it many votes, although, thank God, we can stand it and still have plenty to spare. If it were a State in the Middle West it would be impossible for the Democratic Party to carry it, with any such administration of the Post Office Department as we have had there, in respect to this matter of this Rural Mail Service.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the Senator from Georgia believe that a Postmaster General who has increased the service on the rural routes so that instead of supplying three and a half million people it supplies six million people is deserving of the criticism of the people of this country?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am just answering for my own State, and every other Senator can apply the case to his own State. I think that a Post Office Department that took away from the people of Georgia rights, service, and conveniences which they have had without molestation through succeeding Republican administrations, one after another, has not done the very wisest thing that could have been done. It may be, as my colleague suggests—although Senators on the other side dispute it—that the Post Office Department thinks that exceedingly great burdens can be safely laid on the State of Georgia. It is true that no matter what they may do we will carry Georgia by an overwhelming majority for the Democratic Party in November next, and probably in every other November for many years to come. While that is true, I do say to the Senator from Florida, and to all other Senators who entertain any such idea as that, that if Georgia had been Indiana, or any State similarly situated, then this one thing alone would have lost it to the Democratic Party. Such unnecessary foolishness, as it all was, too.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Department has largely reduced the number of people who obtained the service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I want merely to say a word about the practical side of this question. I never owned an automobile in my life, and I have not had very much personal experience with running automobiles, but I have had a great deal of information on this subject imparted to me by those who do run automobiles.

The standard route in this country for horse-drawn vehicles is supposed to be 24 miles long. I believe I am correct in stating that one of the requirements of the Post Office Department is that there must be 125 boxes on such a route. If that route is extended to 50 miles there must be 250 boxes where the rural carrier has to stop, deliver and receive mail, sell stamps, and so forth. The rural carriers, of course, are all compelled to buy comparatively cheap automobiles—Fords, and cars of that character. My information, Mr. President, is—and I want to call the attention of the Senate to this fact—that none of these automobiles will stand a service of that character for a year without 50 per cent impairment. When a carrier is compelled to make 250 stops and starts, although he may permit his engine to run during the time the car stands still when he is making collections and deliveries of mail, the machinery and everything else connected with the automobile wears out; at the end of the year it is 50 per cent worn out, and before the end of the next year it is entirely gone; so that he can not make a trip of 50 miles and deliver the mail. That is the universal experience of men who are handling the mails in automobiles.

Not only that; but if a carrier starts out with an automobile in the morning, he may get half way on his route, 20 or 25 miles, and something may go wrong. As we all know, such things frequently happen. The old machine may stop right in the middle of the road and can not readily be started, or it may unexpectedly run into a mudhole and can not be pulled out. The carrier must go to a farm somewhere and get a pair of mules and come back and pull his machine out of the mudhole before he can pursue his journey. By that time it is perhaps nearly night, and the patrons all along the route have been disappointed; they have not received their mail as regularly as they have been accustomed to receiving it and as regularly as they are entitled to have it.

I want also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the purpose of the service is to supply the rural population with mail, market reports, and things of that character, and they want it regularly. A man may live a quarter of a mile from a route. He knows usually within two or three minutes when the carrier will be at his place and deliver his mail. He or some member of his family meets the carrier, who may be carrying a parcel-post package which, if he is delayed and no member of the family meets him, must be put on the ground, the box being too small to hold it, and subject to being destroyed in different ways. A farmer who subscribes to a daily paper or takes the market reports usually wants them at noon, when he comes in, feeds his horses, and eats his dinner. He wants to sit quietly down and read the reports and read what his paper contains, so that he may know by the return trip of the carrier what market products to send in and what price he may expect to get. If he does not get his noon mail, he does not care much about it, because, Mr. President, as a rule when night comes he is too tired to read the newspapers, and he goes to bed and does not get the benefit of his mail.

I undertake to say—and I want Senators to bear this in mind—that if we are to embark upon a general system of substituting automobile routes for horse-drawn routes, we are going to destroy the efficiency of the rural service. You can not help it. It is bound to follow. There are some routes that may be consolidated. Perhaps there are some that ought to be. There is no doubt that there are those that will be. But whenever you carry consolidation too far you deprive the rural dweller, the man on the farm, who expects to have his mail delivered regularly and at stated times—compel him to miss his mails and compel him or his wife to go half a mile or such a matter to the box where the mails are to be delivered and wait for an hour because the automobile is mired down somewhere, or you have stopped it and it will not start. All these things, Mr. President, we may expect.

I am not going to discuss the point of order. That has been withdrawn. Now, we are up to the question of adopting or rejecting the amendment proposed by the committee, as I understand. I hope the Senate will adopt it. If we discover in the meantime that there are some imperfections, that there is some language in the bill that ought to be changed, something that ought to be stricken out or something that ought to be added, when the bill goes to conference we will have an opportunity to sit down and quietly consider these things and ascertain with some degree of accuracy what the effect of the change is to be upon the provisions of the bill or other statutes relating to the rural service. That can be done, it seems to me, with a great deal more accuracy and satisfaction than it could be done on the floor of the Senate.

I do not mean to say, and I do not want any Senator to construe what I do say into a belief, even, that the committee feel that this bill is perfect—not by any means. We are glad to have its provisions discussed. We are glad to have amendments suggested; and if, in the wisdom of the Senate, these suggested amendments to the bill shall favorably impress them, let them go into the bill. We have no objection at all to that, Mr. President. But I hope, without further remarks—and this is all I shall say on this amendment—that the Senate will adopt it, and let us go along with the consideration of the bill.

I do not think it is out of place at this time to remind the Senate that unless this bill becomes a law by the 1st of July we will have to extend the former bill by a resolution, which is always to be regretted. I do hope that we will be able to make such progress with the bill as the Senate is willing to make without appearing to be in a hurry, and that we will pass it at the earliest possible time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the passage of the bill by any extended remarks. I am greatly interested in the extension of the rural mail delivery. Next to the schoolhouse and the church, in my judgment, this is the most beneficial educational agency at work in America.

I should like to have the mail delivered daily to every family living in the rural districts of this Republic. They pay the taxes and are entitled to the benefits. I think this department of the Government affects beneficially the agricultural element more than any other department of the Government; and, while I want to see the system perfected in both the rural and the urban districts, I am vastly more interested in the perfection of the rural system than I am in the perfection of the urban system. There is no doubt about the system in the cities and towns being looked after.

It was not the purpose of the committee to limit in any way the wise discretion of the Post Office Department, but, rather, their purpose was to help the department in perfecting this system. The road commissions have nothing to do with the initiation or the establishment of these routes. They do not say whether the routes shall be shortened or lengthened. They do not say whether the routes shall be established or shall not be established. They only make a certificate that the public roads are in such condition that the service can be carried on without interruption during the entire 12 months of the year. That strikes me as both wise and prudent.

There are some parts of this Republic where the public roads are not in condition to permit the mail to be carried over them during the winter months; and while the Post Office Department would work an economy of considerable amount on the different routes, yet the people who are to be served by those routes during the winter seasons would suffer very serious inconvenience. The purpose of the amendment proposed by the committee was that this change should not be made; that the service should not be crippled until the men charged with the duty of looking after the public highways should certify to the department that the roads were in such condition that the service could be carried on properly during the whole year; and that is all there is to it. It is to help the service and not hinder it, and the adoption of this amendment will contribute materially to its efficiency.

I join with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in expressing my very earnest desire that the bill shall be speedily, though maturely, considered and brought to its final passage.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for longer than a very few minutes.

From almost the beginning of free rural delivery down to the present time the Post Office Department has seemed to be working at cross-purposes with the Congress. I do not know why it should be so, but it is nevertheless a fact. The Congress has spoken in no uncertain tones as to its desires, and I think the years of the rural service have demonstrated the wisdom of the action of the Congress in establishing it. No law has ever declared in express terms the exact legislative policy for rural delivery, but there can be no question that the intent was eventually to serve the rural residents with free home-mail service the same as the urban resident is served. It was a matter of evolution, and Congress was content to appropriate money to be used for the extension of free rural delivery. From time to time the routes were limited in their length. Salaries were increased and the carriers' status fixed under the civil-service law.

I certainly do not wish to say anything that would misrepresent the attitude or desire of any administration, but it has seemed to me that the department has not been in sympathy with free rural delivery as established by Congress. It has thought of contract service, that it might be better to provide for the delivery of the mail by contract. To my mind that would defeat the original intent of the Congress. It has been extending; it has been giving good satisfaction to the people, and yet of late years it has seemed to the department that it would be best to depart from the original idea and to lengthen the routes as much as possible and with very little regard to the character of the service itself.

There has not been harmony between the Congress and the department, and of late this has come to a point where to me it seems as though the Senate of the United States must take its stand and insist that its legally expressed will shall be observed.

The Senate committee has been charged by the department with doing something to lessen the service. That is not true. There is no reliable proof that can be brought forward to show that the Senate provision will lessen the service to the people of the United States. It will extend the service. The correct record will disclose that while the recent departmental changes may have given rural delivery to some who did not have it before, it will also disclose that much of that service has been indifferent, and many who had good service before have either poorer service or none at all because of these changes. The Senate amendment declares that as nearly as practicable rural delivery shall be supplied to all rural inhabitants. The department will have great difficulty in convincing the farmer that Congress is hostile to his rural-delivery needs.

I do not care to discuss this matter further, because discussion is unnecessary and simply delays the action of the Senate. I want, however, to refer to one thing in the amendment which has not been discussed, except by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN].

The last part of this amendment provides for the payment of the salaries which I believe were improperly withheld from the carriers last year by the Postmaster General.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me just one minute, I think the Senator from Florida secured a separation of the question somehow or other, and that is not up yet. I am not sure I am right about that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator going to make a point of order on that part of the amendment?

Mr. BRYAN. I am going to make it a little later.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator is going to make a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then I will withhold any further remarks on that subject until we reach it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator had better speak now, because when the point of order is made he can not speak on it.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator may as well make his remarks now.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reference to that provision. It simply illustrates the statement I made a moment ago, that the department does not seem to be willing to work in harmony with the Congress. Under the appropriation bill for 1914 we provided a limit of carriers' salary, with the certain knowledge, as we supposed, that the rule would be followed in the future, as it had been in the past, and that said amount should be paid to the carriers on the standard routes. It appears, however, that the Postmaster General exercised what he considered his discretion, and imposed certain conditions upon the carrying service before the carriers could obtain the maximum salary; and although Congress had appropriated the money he withheld it, and thus saw fit practically to reduce the salaries of the carriers.

I said on this floor a year ago, when this subject was up, that the salaries fixed by Congress would some time be paid. I believed then and I believe now that those carriers a portion of whose salary was withheld have a valid claim against the Government for the deficiency.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator if I am correct in the understanding that that money is now in the Treasury of the United States, appropriated for this very purpose?

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator is correct.

Mr. GALLINGER. And this provides simply for its payment?

Mr. TOWNSEND. For its payment. The salary that has been withheld.

We are asking, in this amendment, that this money shall be paid as the Senate intended that it should be paid when it was appropriated. Congress had no idea that the Postmaster General was going to exercise a discretion practically to take out of the pockets of the carriers the money which the Congress had appropriated for them, and which it had intended that they should receive. Therefore, I am very much in favor of that part of the amendment which simply directs that money already appropriated and earned shall be paid to those to whom it belongs. The Government can not for the purpose of making a false show of economy withhold money out of the salaries of its employees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall support the amendment of the committee.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has mentioned a fact that I have observed for nearly the past six years. I went upon the Post Office Committee when I first came to the Senate, and I found that my Republican colleagues, who at that time were in the majority on the committee, were struggling with their Post Office Department to protect this service. We have been struggling with it ever since. I recently had occasion to look back somewhat into the history of the service, and there has been almost a continual struggle by Congress to preserve the rural service and to protect it against departmental hindrances and departmental curtailments.

I think it has been a great service; that it has done much to develop the rural sections, to stimulate and advance higher standards of agricultural industry; and, while the immediate return from the postage received has not been sufficient to compensate for the cost, as a contribution to our national prosperity this service has been fully worth what it has cost.

I am in favor of this amendment because I think the time has come when we may well let the department understand that the legislative branch of the Government is located up here on the hill, and that when legislation is passed and approved it is not subject to be set aside by a fourth-class postmaster or Fourth Assistant Postmaster General; that that is not a province of his office. Some Fourth Assistants would reasonably well fill fourth-class post offices. Some I would prefer not to have in a fourth-class post office if I had to be served by it. [Laughter.]

I think this amendment a valuable provision. I am sure none of the other States have suffered utter demoralization of their rural service as my own State has suffered it. Indeed, I took occasion to compare the number of rural routes cut out in Georgia with those in Texas and in Pennsylvania, and I think we had four times as many cut out as both those States put together. The service was literally torn to pieces. Usually it was done on a map here in Washington. Occasionally an inspector advised upon the subject. I will mention one of the valuable contributions to the service by a civil-service post-office inspector.

We have in northeastern Georgia quite a large and populous agricultural county called Madison. Two railroads run north and south, one east and one west of it, going from Washington to Atlanta. The streams run southeast. From a nice little town on the Seaboard Railroad, on the eastern side of the county, we had four rural routes that went out between the streams and across the bridges, serving the county well. There was a cross railroad between the Southern and the Seaboard. A capable civil-service inspector changed the rural routes from a nice little town on the main railroad line going out between the streams and between the hills to the cross railroad, and put on one automobile to serve that large county, across hills and across streams. Of course it was preposterous; but he manifested his capacity for his task by asking, just before he left, which was the rainy season in northeast Georgia, and how many months it was entirely dry, and how many months it rained all the time. [Laughter.]

Some of my friends representing States in the Northwest will recognize the fact that he came from beyond the Mississippi and simply knew nothing about the character of the country or the character of the water flow.

We did succeed, on protest, in having the routes restored to their original place. At first I was assured by this capable Fourth Assistant Postmaster General that he had made a saving of some $16,000 by changes in that locality, and he desired to use it somewhere else, and would be glad to know how best to use it. I said, "Start by putting back those routes which you took off in Madison County and abolish this cross-country route that you have foolishly undertaken to establish."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think that all of the difficulty could be obviated by having a civil-service employee from the Weather Bureau assigned to the task of laying out the routes? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I think he would do better. Anything would have done better.

Now, of course, this was only one case, and it was an exaggerated blunder that they made in this particular instance, and everybody admitted it. What I would emphasize is that the responsibility falls on us in part for what is to take place, and it is not wise to abrogate that responsibility by dumping all details upon a department, and leaving our people subject to the caprice of a department, when we can help it.

What I said with reference to the ill feeling in my State was in part serious and in part not so. There was great displeasure. With a great deal of labor we have had corrected a number of the blunders made in the department; but I think every Congressman from Georgia and both the Senators for several months had piles of letters each day, and as a reult of personal examinations were thoroughly satisfied of the blunders made, and we succeeded in getting quite a number of them relieved.

In this connection I wish to say that we waive those blunders. We regret the presence of the Fourth Assistant; but in any event, if he is presented for confirmation next spring, those of us on this side have the right to vote as we please, and I hardly think he would receive support from the State represented by my colleague and myself. Our people as a whole are very much pleased with the splendid administration that has been given by President Wilson, with the splendid legislation that has been passed, and I do not think the Fourth Assistant will seriously affect the political result in Georgia next November.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, this is a subject about which I am not at all well informed. I know very little about the intricacies of the Rural Delivery Mail Service, and not very much more about the law governing its administration. With respect to those matters I am quite willing to take the judgment of the committee, which has investigated the matter.

I only rose to say that there has been a great deal of disturbance in my State over the changes that have been made by the Post Office Department in the Rural Service routes. How well founded they may be, of course, I am not able to say; but there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction with what has been done by the Post Office Department in that respect. I have uniformly referred these matters to the Postmaster General, and he has said that they would try out these changes, and that if they are not satisfactory, of course, they will be changed.

It is perfectly apparent to me, however, that Congress should do something to straighten out this condition of things; and as the committee has taken this course I am quite willing to follow its lead. For that reason I shall be disposed to support this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I noticed that the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] was about to rise. Did he intend to speak on the question? I shall be pleased to yield if the Senator wishes to speak at this time. I have something to say before we vote on the amendment; but I do not care to take up the time if the Senator from Florida desires to speak.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to speak now. I may do so later.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I will move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, one moment. The question is whether we should recess or adjourn. Now, we are quitting at 5 o'clock. If the Post Office bill can hold the Senate but a limited length of time, I think we ought to have our time in the early morning for the ordinary calendar. For several weeks we have been following the practice of recessing at 5 o'clock, because we get through with the work we want to do on the unfinished business, and we have been losing the time from the close of the morning hour to 2 o'clock, when we might be handling the regular calendar.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, there is only this objection to that course: By the 30th day of this month this fiscal year will be up. The appropriation bills ought to be given the right of way, and the exclusive right of way, until then.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If they hold the right of way, well and good; but they are giving up the right of way at 5 o'clock, instead of going on with the work until 6.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I am in entire sympathy with what the Senator says about staying here. I am not in sympathy with substituting anything else. But why should we take a recess now, at 5 o'clock, instead of running on until 6 o'clock? And if we are going to take a recess, why not take it until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, and run until 6?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, a reason, if the Senator will permit me, is that this bill affects every neighborhood in the United States. That is one reason. A very large number of the Members of the Senate, if not a majority of the Members are absent. I know of a number of them who desire to be heard on the questions growing out of the section that is under discussion. That is the reason that moved me to suggest that a recess or an adjournment should be taken at this time. It is too important a question to be discussed here and disposed of by a handful of men.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are others here who want to speak upon it this afternoon. The Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] intends to discuss it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is ready.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Nebraska has just said that he proposed to discuss it. We are not proposing to vote at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I withdraw my motion to take a recess at this time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I had not supposed, in view of the statement of the Senator from Indiana, that a vote would be taken right away. In view of some of the statements which have been made here this afternoon I think it is only justice to the Post Office Department that an opportunity may be given to some of us to find out what statement they have to make in answer to the complaints that have been made against that department.

I do not suppose that the Post Office Department picked out the State of Georgia for special punishment. I do not suppose it abolished routes down there just for the fun of the thing. I do know that a burden rests upon the Post Office Department in the administration of the Rural Delivery Service that is not pleasant to perform. I do not suppose people living in a county which has a rural route on the east side and the west side and the north side and the south side of every section of land in it, as was the case in Michigan, approve of the action of the Post Office Department in abolishing a good many of them and in consolidating others.

The junior Senator from Georgia objects to the House provision which allows everybody on the route to vote as to whether they can have a motor route or not, but he commends the provision which the committee report that the local road officials shall decide for the Government whether a rural route should be established or not.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will pardon me, but that is not what I said. He does not want to misrepresent me. I did not say that, but what I said was I thoroughly commended the proposition where they should give a certificate of the facts.

Mr. BRYAN. Let us see about that.

Standard motor-vehicle routes, which shall be 50 miles in length and shall only be established upon certificate of the duly qualified county-road officials that the character of the roads proposed to be used, as well as climatic conditions, will warrant regular and practically uninterrupted service throughout the year.

That is to say, before the Post Office Department can establish a motor-vehicle route; and they have established routes, and said before the committee, if I am correct in my recollection of the language used, that in a good many places a route could not be maintained throughout the year, but they could supplement it for one month or for two months, or whatever was necessary by a wagon route.

Mr. KERN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that the provision contained in the bill under discussion would put out of business practically every automobile route in my State of Indiana, every one of which, as far as I know, is giving excellent satisfaction to the people.

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly; and Indiana has 40 per cent of the total route mileage improved, and you are going to stand here and say that unless the Post Office Department can maintain a motor route through the winter, when the snow is upon the ground, when everybody knows they can not do it, and the road official or somebody says so, then he can not establish a motor-vehicle route.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield, probably I can give him some information.

Mr. BRYAN. I have considerable information upon it.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I can give what the proposition of the Postmaster General was on that question. You are now receiving 11 months' continuous, uninterrupted service. What is the difference? Take the language put there——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, just because the department said anything I do not agree to it. I do not think I have slavishly followed the department. I do not care what the department thinks about it. I know that you are making a great mistake when as a business proposition you undertake to say either that a majority of the people living along the rural route shall petition Congress before a motor route can be put in or that you have to convince the local road supervisor that it ought to be done. Now, let us see. The Senator from Georgia said that it was not exactly right to leave it to a majority of the people along the route, but it was all right to leave it to the local road supervisor or authority, whoever he might be, and what reason did he give, Mr. President?

Mr. HARDWICK. Before the Senator——

Mr. BRYAN. Let me finish. Because he was responsible to the people, and having been elected by the people, would carry out their will.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. This is a business proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. BRYAN. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not say what the Senator attributed to me. I said I saw no objection to leaving it to the local boards of the State to report what the condition of the road was and who were elected to construct and maintain those roads. If they recommend it a hundred times the department is not obliged to establish it. That is the difference.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the trouble. They can not establish them. So what do you do, Mr. President? You take a business proposition and make out of it a question of the desire of some local authority, some local representative.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, in view of a certain statement which was made, I wish to ask either the chairman of the committee or the Senator from Georgia whether the Senate committee amendment would at all interfere with the conditions that exist in my own State, where I meet automobiles every day in summer carrying the mail, but those same men use the sleigh and horse in wintertime.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all. The bill especially in another section provides for that. It is not to interfere with that.

Mr. BRYAN. On the contrary, I say it does, and I will undertake to show it right now. The provision which I have just read says that they shall not establish any unless it can be operated practically without interruption throughout the year, and on page 33 I read this language:

> The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to reorganize and readjust existing rural mail delivery service where necessary to conform to the standards herein prescribed.

You are not only going to stop the devolpment of this service, but you are going to break down what has already been done, and for what?

Mr. HARDWICK. May I call the attention of the Senator to the language? I do not suppose the Senator purposely stated some things in the bill and purposely failed to call attention to other things in the bill.

Mr. BRYAN. No.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore I call his attention to the following language:

Provided further——

Mr. BRYAN. Where is the Senator reading?

Mr. HARDWICK. Page 33, line 4.

> Provided further, That carriers in rural mail-delivery service shall furnish and maintain at their own expense all necessary vehicle equipment for prompt handling of the mail: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed, and no order shall be issued, to prevent the use of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes.

Mr. BRYAN. What does that mean?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the case exactly that the Senator from New Hampshire raised.

Mr. BRYAN. That is not what I understand. The Senator from New Hampshire wants to know if under this system where they now have rural motor routes of 50 miles in length this bill would interfere with them.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President, the case that I cited is not a route 50 miles in length, but a standard route of 24 miles.

Mr. BRYAN. Is the Senator sure about that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am quite sure. The case I cited was not a 50-mile route, but a standard 24-mile route. There are several of that kind.

Mr. BRYAN. They complain about a good many things. It is very easy for every rural carrier to go along his route and ask people to object to his route being consolidated with another and then sign a petition. In the last three or four years it has been demonstrated that it is not difficult for rural carriers to get a petition for increase of salary, and everybody signs the petition. In the year ending June 30, 1915, when every business in this country was economizing, and when the Post Office Department, that seems to be in such an ill odor among certain Senators upon the Democratic side, appealed to the Senate committee to help economize and to ask these people to forego the automatic promotion for one year, the Senate committee agreed with it, and then there was power enough in these organizations to have the Senate committee reverse itself and let them enjoy their own sweet will about it. That is the plain truth about it. The truth about this thing is that these rural carriers want to hold their jobs, and very naturally they want to hold their jobs, and they do not want a wagon route consolidated into a motor route.

Now, what harm can it do the people on the route who are being served? They get their mails just as rapidly. There has been no impairment of this service under the present Postmaster General. It has been vastly improved. One reason why I wanted this part of the bill to go over until morning was to find out just exactly how many people were being served at the time the present Postmaster General assumed office and how many are being served to-day. My recollection is that the people served to-day are about 29,000,000, and that about 25,000,000 were being served by this system when he was sworn into office. Is that a bad record? Is that a record that justifies Senators in standing here to criticize the people who have made it possible? The present Postmaster General has added 2,800 wagon routes and 800 motor routes, and as already shown extended the service to 4,000,000 additional rural residents in this country. There are a few things that have been done by the Postmaster General since I have been in the Senate that I have not approved of, and I have not hesitated to say so, but I think no man can justly criticize him when faced by a deficit of over $22,000,000 he so conducted the affairs of this Government as to reduce it by 50 per cent without injury to any branch of the service, and while that was going on he extended the rural service carrying the mail to an extent that ought to bring commendation instead of condemnation.

It will not do, Mr. President, to say that you prefer to let a State inspector decide this question. I believe in the rights of the States and I believe also in the rights of the Federal Government. I do not believe you can blend the jurisdiction of the Federal Government with the jurisdiction of the State government. I think they are separate and distinct, and it is not very logical to my mind to have the action of the department of the Federal Government controlled by the will of an official in a county anywhere in the United States.

The opposition to the improvements that have gone on have been opposition that results from an organized effort. I can not believe that the people who are being served care very much whether their mail is delivered to them in an automobile or a wagon. They want the service. They have received the service. More of them have received the service than ever before.

Mr. President, if this provision is placed upon the bill we are going to hamper the Post Office Department.

Sir, I dislike to refer to local conditions, but I can name a city in my State that has been entitled to seven routes for over three years before this provision was made that motor routes might be established. Because of the liberality of Congress the Postmaster General did not feel justified in making the extension. Since this provision has been placed in he has been able to order that service in. It was not done by correspondence with a fourth-class postmaster. However they do in Georgia, in this instance they sent a man to investigate conditions, and he rode along with other Post Office officials over every road in that county where it was proposed to establish additional routes, and he had his own judgment and the report of men familiar with it. The Postmaster General can get, without any additional legislation, the advice from men who have traveled the roads, and if they establish routes that they can not maintain now they can abolish them. I believe it is a mistake. I know it is wrong to say that you shall not develop this great service unless it happens to suit some one particular individual in some particular county.

It seems to me that the provision passed by the House, bad as it is, is preferable to the Senate committee bill, because after a while the people of the country will wake up to the fact that it is of minor significance as to how many rural carriers there may be, but it is of real importance that the people living in the rural communities shall have the advantage of receiving their mails just as the people in the cities have.

The truth is, Mr. President, that in the differences of opinion that have been referred to here as existing between the department heads and the legislative branch of the Government the heads of the departments want all the power they can get. You have to give them the power to carry out the duties imposed upon them—the detail duties.

The trouble with the Post Office bill is always this, that Congress itself does not look at it in a business way, but in a political way. It is regarded here not by what it costs, not by the service to be rendered, but by the wishes of interested people.

I gather from what has taken place that the junior Senator from Georgia prepared this amendment. Both the Senators from Georgia seem for some reason or other to have a dislike to the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. Mr. President, those men come and go, but we ought not to establish a policy, we ought not to uproot a great system upon the personal likes or dislikes of two or three men.

I have said about all I care to say on this bill. I am very sure that it is a great mistake to undertake to decide this question upon what people not connected in the remotest degree with the carrying on or the success of the business may think about it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] notified me that he had to leave the Chamber and that he could not speak this afternoon.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator from Nebraska want to speak on this subject?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; he wants to speak on the subject. I will say to the Senator having the bill in charge that the Senator from Nebraska had to leave the Chamber and he would very much prefer to speak—in fact, he wants to speak—upon it to-morrow morning. If there is no other Senator who desires to proceed at this time, I would suggest to the Senator that we take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before the Senate adjourns or takes a recess this afternoon, I wish to call attention to Senate resolution 195, being Calendar No. 416. It is a resolution by which it is proposed that the standing rules of the Senate may be amended. The provision of the resolution is:

That if 16 Senators present to the Senate at any time a signed motion to bring to a close the debate upon any pending measure, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate and at the close of the morning hour on the following calendar day lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present the Chair shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?"

And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those voting, then said measure shall be in order to the exclusion of all other business, except a motion to recess or adjourn.

Thereafter no Senator shall be entitled to speak more than one hour on the bill, the amendments thereto, and motions affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Chair to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. No dilatory motions shall be in order, and all points of order and appeals from the decision of the Chair shall be decided without debate.

I think, Mr. President, the letter "s" in the word "motions," in line 7, on page 2, is a misprint, and that the resolution should read:

No dilatory motion shall be in order, and all points of order and appeals from the decision of the Chair shall be decided without debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does not the Senator from Georgia think it unconstitutional to require the presiding officer to act as a timekeeper, adding to the duties of the Vice President? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose the presiding officer would have the right to delegate that service to the Secretary of the Senate if he saw fit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. With that understanding, the Chair withdraws the suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate this afternoon because I wish at some time to-morrow to ask unanimous consent to fix a day on which we may vote upon this proposed amendment to the rules and any amendments that may be offered to it. I think every Senator knows just what is in the resolution and understands just what it means; and, if the Senate is willing to vote upon it, we can agree upon a time by unanimous consent. I will not ask for unanimous consent now, because before the sense of the Senate could be taken a roll call would be necessary, and it might not disclose a quorum, but at some hour to-morrow which may seem favorable I do hope that the Senate will give unanimous consent to set a time when this resolution may come to a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia does not anticipate any filibustering tactics during the remainder of this session, does he?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No, I do not; I hope not; but I think that, without any filibustering tactics, we have wasted a good deal of time which we would not have wasted if we had had the power to spur forward a little.

Mr. GALLINGER. That may be so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not consider that we have had any filibustering at this session; I do not think it would be just to claim that we have had. We have had, however, a sort of carelessness on the part of some Senators, resulting in the waste of a great deal of time.

I was very much impressed with the debate we had on the military bill when by unanimous consent we agreed to a 10-minute limit on speeches. The Senate was full; we discussed questions; Senators listened; and we accomplished something by what we said. If we had not had under the unanimous-consent agreement that 10-minute rule governing the debate, I doubt very much whether we would have been able to have made as good a military bill as we did make.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator, Mr. President, that that was a very illuminating debate, and I wish that all our debates could be carried on in the same way; but, while I agreed as a member of the committee to have this resolution reported, I think the Senator will find a good deal of difficulty if he undertakes to curb conversation in this body by a two-thirds vote. I think so; I may be wrong. However, I think the subject ought to be considered at some time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I believe if we could have a vote we would adopt the resolution. I doubt whether we will have to use it often; but the fact that we could use it would enable us to prevent a half dozen Senators from blocking a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. My own opinion is that one of the most valuable modes of handling our business is, after a bill has been somewhat elaborately discussed, to set a time for voting upon it under a unanimous-consent agreement, whereby there is a limit of 10 minutes to each speech on each amendment. Under such circumstances Senators will stay and listen, and Senators will say what they have to say on the subject under consideration with no useless waste of words.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not wish to debate the question now, of course, for I realize it is not up for consideration, but I want to say to the Senator very briefly that as he read the resolution it impressed me that one of its serious defects is that, even if it should be the desire of the Senate to curtail debate upon the vote of two-thirds of its Members, to limit each Senator to the period of one hour on the main bill, whatever it may be, and all amendments, seems to me to be a dangerous thing to agree to. I call the Senator's attention to a situation that frequently happens: After a very important measure has been considered for days and unanimous consent has been obtained for a vote on it, and all the pending amendments have been disposed of, some Senator may arise and propose an entirely new bill as a substitute, bringing up entirely new features, upon which there has been no discussion whatever, and it might very probably happen, under the terms of the resolution as it is now framed, that when Senators are ready to vote on a measure which they have debated for weeks and an entirely new proposition may be thrust upon them, they have gagged themselves, and having exhausted their hour, can not say a word.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad to have the Senator's criticism. When I first drafted the resolution it did not contain the hour limitation; I simply incorporated the provision commonly placed in unanimous-consent agreements, that not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed to each Senator upon the bill or any amendment to it. I myself would prefer that mode of expression.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I did not mean to precipitate any debate on the merits of the resolution now, but merely to call the attention of the Senator to that one feature.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But we ought not to adjourn until 6 o'clock. We ought to stay here every afternoon and work until 6 o'clock; and I am extremely gratified to have the Senator's suggestion. We certainly ought to avoid in any rule that we adopt a provision which might make it possible to present amendments without having any opportunity for their consideration, although I believe brief consideration is more valuable than lengthy consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But it frequently has happened that a Senator, upon a very important matter, has been driven to a yea-and-nay vote without even the opportunity to explain his vote, much less consider the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator if he will not take the time to-night to think about that subject and consider what suggestion he would make as to some kind of modification? It might be well to limit each Senator to not more than a half hour on the bill and 10 minutes on each amendment. I would rather prefer that, I think, to the hour limit which has been put in the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, this resolution, while it is a resolution to curtail debate, is of itself subject to unlimited debate, unless unanimous consent to vote on it can be procured, and I am sure there is no disposition whatever anywhere to take any snap judgment upon the resolution. It is a weighty and fundamental departure from the previous history of the proceedings of the Senate, and, of course, every Senator will want to give it his best attention. I certainly will give it mine.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Connecticut and also to the Senator from New Hampshire a modification of the time contained in this resolution to half an hour on the bill and not more than 10 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is one suggestion I would make to the Senator concerning the matter, to which I hope he will give a little attention, and that is whether or not a motion of this kind could be made day after day, provided it is voted down. We would waste a great deal of time under those circumstances. We might incorporate in the resolution a provision, perhaps, that such a motion could not be made oftener than once a week, or something of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator, then, who really wanted to move forward would be using dilatory tactics and defeating his very object. I do not think we would be in danger from anything of that kind.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that instead of cutting the time for general debate down to an hour or half an hour he leave that as it is and in addition thereto give 10 minutes upon each amendment. That, I think, would be satisfactory to a great many of us who think that half an hour for general debate would be too short a time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think, also, that with that kind of a limitation nearly any measure would be controlled by the Senate, if necessary, and brought to a vote. I will be perfectly willing myself to make it an hour on the main bill and not more than 10 minutes on any one amendment, and I will be glad to have any suggestion to-morrow from any Senator on the subject.

RECESS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Tuesday, June 20, 1916) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 21, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who dost control the destiny of men and of nations, to Thee we lift up our hearts in gratitude for that parental care which Thou hast ever exercised over us as individuals and as a people, and we fervently pray for the continuation of the same to all our future. Point out, we beseech Thee, our duty and give to us the disposition and strength to do it now and ever more in the spirit of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. This was the day set for the fortification bill to be disposed of.

Mr. MANN. I believe there is a special order for to-day, is there not?

The SPEAKER. There is a special order for to-day.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present. The matter that is now coming up before the House I think should have a full membership to hear it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper was ordered to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees. The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 285 Members have responded. A quorum is present.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were reopened.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DRUKKER, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence, for two days, on account of important business.

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, while the committee is not divided in the report on this question, yet I will with pleasure give to gentlemen who are opposed to the adoption of the resolution which I shall now offer equal opportunity to be heard upon it.

By direction of the select committee appointed by the House to investigate and report upon the misconduct of H. Snowden Marshall for a violation of the privileges of the House I present the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the matter of the alleged misconduct of H. Snowden Marshall, Mr. MOON offered the following:

House resolution 268.

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant at Arms, commanding him to take in custody, wherever to be found, the body of H. Snowden Marshall, of the State of New York, and to proceed forthwith to bring the said H. Snowden Marshall to the bar of the House of Representatives, to answer the charge that he, on March 4, 1916, in the city of New York, did violate the privileges of the House of Representatives of the United States by writing and causing to be published the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
New York, March 4, 1916.

SIR: Yesterday afternoon, as I am informed, your honorable committee ordered the arrest of Mr. L. R. Holme, a representative of a newspaper which had published an article at which you took offense. The unfortunate gentleman of the press was placed in custody under your orders. He was taken to the United States marshal to be placed in confinement (I do not understand whether his sentence was to be one day or a dozen years). The marshal very properly declined to receive the prisoner. This left you at a loss, and I am advised that you tried to work your way out of the awkward situation by having Mr. Holme brought back and telling him that you were disposed to be "kind" to him, and then discharged him for the purpose of avoiding unpleasant consequences to yourselves.

You are exploiting charges against me of oppressive conduct toward a Member of your honorable body who is charged with a violation of law and of oppressive conduct on my part toward shysters in the blackmailing and bankruptcy business.

I may be able to lighten your labors by offering to resign if you can indicate anything I ever did that remotely approximates the lawless tyranny of your order of arrest of Mr. Holme.

The supposed justification of your order that Mr. Holme be placed in custody was his refusal to answer the question you asked as to where he got the information on which was based the article which displeased you.

It is not necessary for you to place anyone under arrest in order to get the answers to the question which you asked Mr. Holme, because I can and will answer it. I gave Mr. Holme information, part of which he published and from which he made deductions, so that if your honorable committee has a grievance, it is against me and not against him.

What I told him was about as follows:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

I said that your whole proceeding here was irregular and extraordinary; that I had never heard of such conduct of an impeachment proceeding; that charges of this sort were not usually heard in public until the House of Representatives had considered them and were willing to stand back of them.

I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, had come here and had held public hearings; that among your witnesses you had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistants under the full privilege of testifying before a congressional committee.

I told him that you had called one of my junior assistants before you and had attempted to make it publicly appear that his refusal to answer your questions as to what occurred in the grand jury room in the Buchanan case was due solely to my orders. I said that at the time you attempted to convey this public impression you knew that it was misleading because I had been asked by you to produce the minutes of the grand jury and had been instructed by the Attorney General not to comply with your request, as you well knew. I showed him the telegram of the Attorney General to me and showed him a copy of my letter to you, dated February 29, 1916, in which I sent you a copy of the telegram of the Attorney General instructing me not to give you the grand jury minutes.

I told him that you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with Buchanan's counsel, Walsh and David Slade, in constant conference with you. I said that I believed that every word of the evidence, whether in so-called secret sessions or not, had been placed at the disposal of these worthies, and that I would be just as willing to give the grand jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee.

I told him that I did not share the views which seemed to prevail in your subcommittee on this subject. I said that I regarded a Member of Congress who would take money for an unlawful purpose from any foreign agent as a traitor, and that it was a great pity that such a person could only be indicted under the Sherman law, which carries only one year in jail as punishment.

I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant; how you had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered.

I told him that I would not permit the prosecution of the persons whose cause you had apparently espoused to be impeded by you; I said that if you wanted the minutes of the grand jury in any case, you would not get them as long as I remained in office.

You will observe from the foregoing statement that what Mr. Holme published may have been based on what I said. If you have any quarrel, it is with me, and not with him.

It is amazing to me to think that you supposed that I did not understand what you have been attempting to do during your visit here. I realized that your effort was to ruin me and my office by publishing with your full approval the complaints of various persons who have run afoul of the criminal law under my administration. Your subcommittee has endeavored by insulting questions to my assistants and others, by giving publicity and countenance to the charges of rascals, and by refusing to listen to the truth and refusing to examine public records to which your attention was directed, to publicly disgrace me and my office.

I propose to make this letter public.

Respectfully,

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL,
United States Attorney.

Hon. C. C. CARLIN,
Chairman Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, 323 Federal Building, New York, N. Y.

Resolved, That the said H. Snowden Marshall, in writing and publishing said letter, was guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives, and that the said H. Snowden Marshall be furnished with a copy of this resolution, and a copy of the report of the select committee of the House of Representatives, appointed to investigate the charges made against him in the House of Representatives.

Resolved further, That when H. Snowden Marshall shall be brought to the bar of the House, to answer the charge of having violated the privileges of the House of Representatives, as afore set out, the Speaker shall then cause to be read to said H. Snowden Marshall the findings of fact and findings of law by the special committee of the House, charged with the duty of investigating whether or not the said H. Snowden Marshall had violated the privileges of the House of Representatives, or was in contempt of same; the Speaker shall then inquire of said H. Snowden Marshall if he desires to be heard, and to have counsel on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives for having violated its privileges. If the said H. Snowden Marshall desires to avail himself of either of these privileges, the same shall be granted him. If not, the House shall thereupon proceed to take order in the matter.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would have been well for some member of the committee to have prepared a written argument on this report. The report itself is rather brief, but if I can have the attention of the House I will discuss orally the main features involved in this matter.

The House must observe, to begin with, that this is not an impeachment proceeding. It is a charge of violation of the privileges of the House by H. Snowden Marshall, of New York, and thereby a contempt of the House of Representatives. The fact that Mr. Marshall may have been impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors need not be determined, as to his guilt or innocence, one way or the other. For the purposes of this case it has no legal effect. We are here simply to examine the question whether, pending the impeachment proceedings against him, he was guilty of that conduct which brought into disrepute and contempt the House of Representatives of the United States. I want you to follow me carefully, because I shall discuss only the law and the material facts in the case. I can not and would not undertake to state all the testimony before the select committee. That testimony is here written and printed. It is before the House, and you have read the report. Take up the facts as found by the special committee. First, H. Snowden Marshall is a United States district attorney for the southern district of the State of New York, and was such on the 14th of December, 1915, and is now. On the 14th of December, 1915, Mr. BUCHANAN, a Representative in Congress from the State of Illinois, upon his authority as such Representative, arose upon the floor of this House and impeached H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for New York, in pursuance to the Constitution and in the manner provided by law, of high crimes and misdemeanors. He was charged with official oppression and tyranny in office.

In answer to that preferment of charges involving the violation on the part of this officer of his duty there came an indictment against Mr. BUCHANAN and others in the district court of the State of New York preferred by Mr. Marshall. Next, Mr. BUCHANAN, on the 12th of January, 1916, following the indictment against him in New York on the 28th of December, again rose on the floor of the House and made more specific charges of high crimes and misdemeanors against Mr. Marshall—39 charges, I believe, in all—involving a breach of public duty on the part of this gentleman. The main charge was that Mr. Marshall, without proof, without cause, and without justice, had forced through the grand jury of the Federal court in New York indictments against various persons without any proof, and therefore in violation of the law and the Constitution of our country. In other words, there are a vast number of charges involving not only technical violations of official duties and obligations but moral turpitude on the part of this officer. What next should have occurred and did occur? The House of Representatives directed an investigation of these impeachment charges and appointed the Judiciary Committee of the House to hear proof and report, and gave to that committee the power of appointing a subcommittee clothed with all the power and authority of the Judiciary Committee as conferred by the resolution of the House of Representatives, and this power was plenary, involving all of the power and authority of the House itself. Then, the Judiciary Committee appointed to hear the proof and determine the facts, to reach a conclusion of law and make a recommendation to this House, three of its distinguished Members, Mr. CARLIN, Mr. GARD, and Mr. NELSON. They heard proof here. They went to New York and took proof there, acting within the scope and power of the authority delegated to them by this House. While they were taking the testimony, while they were seeking to ascertain the fact whether this official was guilty of the tyranny with which he was charged, we find him intervening in his own defense, intervening in the defense of a witness with whom he was in no way connected; and as a pretext that this committee had violated the rights of a witness, he gratuitously offers to this committee a most outrageous insult.

I need not for the moment refer to the language of the letter of March 4, 1916, by Mr. Marshall to this committee, upon which the charge of contempt is predicated. You have heard that letter read. What was the next step in this matter? The subcommittee returned to Washington, reported the facts to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee in turn reported the facts to the House of Representatives, and recommended the appointment of a select committee to hear the facts and state the law and recommend a procedure against this defendant, if found in their judgment to be guilty of a violation of the privileges of the House of Representatives. That committee met after its appointment and called before it the members of the subcommittee and H. Snowden Marshall. The subcommittee, it will be seen from the evidence, substantiated the facts as they have been stated by me to you. They enlarged very much upon the facts as I have stated, giving all of the circumstances that attended, to strengthen and enforce the opinion that has been here expressed. Mr. Marshall appeared before that committee. He filed and read to us a carefully prepared statement, which you will find in the record in this case. He then desired to make personal statements, which was permitted. He was cross-examined. I invite your attention, gentlemen, those of you who would read this report, to the facts as disclosed by Mr. Marshall himself, to determine the animus and the malice of the man, or if in your judgment there be facts, to determine those that exist in mitigation of his alleged offense. That committee having heard all of the proof and considered the law and the facts, have reported to you in the report that is now before you—report No. 544, of the select committee of the House of Representatives, in the matter of the alleged contempt of H. Snowden Marshall.

We reached the conclusion under the law and the facts that Mr. Marshall was guilty of contempt of the House of Representatives because of the writing of the letter which has been referred to and read. He made a breach of the privileges of the House. We further found that the manner and the conduct of this gentleman, the reitteration and the reaffirmation of the charges he had made, which we had supposed to be in the heat of passion, were renewed after full and careful deliberation and announced by him to be true. No apology of any kind, he tells you, is to be offered for that which he said, bringing into reproach the good name of this House, bringing into derision and scorn and contempt before the American people their Representatives sent here to protect the honor and the dignity of a great Republic.

Of course, upon the state of facts, there must be made an application of the law of your country to determine the proper conclusions that you may reach. It is said by the friends of Mr. Marshall that a district attorney is not subject to impeachment. The Constitution confers upon the House of Representatives the sole power of impeachment, but trial of the impeachment under the articles that the House may present is before the Senate of the United States.

Article II, section 4, of the Constitution says:

> The President, the Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors.

You will observe that it is necessary for me to discuss this question of impeachment for a moment, because if the power of impeachment and procedure we have undertaken is not authorized by law, then the contempt proceedings must necessarily fall. A United States attorney is a civil officer within the meaning of this section of the Constitution. This is not an open question. It is one that has been settled long since. The term "civil officer" in that section of the Constitution is used in contradistinction to military officers, for the reason that the law provides means by which military officers who encroach upon the rights of the people or violate the law may be punished and removed from their office, and that is not by impeachment.

What is an officer, anyway? One who holds an office. An office is a position of trust, or honor, or profit, to which duties are attached to be performed. Many years ago a great constitutional writer, passing upon this question, said:

> For reasons already given it is obvious that the only persons liable to impeachment are those who are or have been in public office. All executive and judicial officers, from the President downward, from the judges of the Supreme Court to those of the most inferior tribunals, are included in this description.

Then he is an officer; he is part of the power and sovereignty of the American people in the discharge of great duties that are partly ministerial and partly judicial, and therefore is subject to impeachment.

Mr. Story, the great commentator upon the Constitution of the United States, says:

> All officers of the United States who hold their appointment under the National Government, whether their duties be executive or judicial in the highest or the lowest departments of the Government, with the exception of officers in the Army and Navy, are properly civil officers within the meaning of the Constitution and liable to impeachment and removal from office.

Now, I take it, therefore, that that question is settled by the adjudications of the country. But they say again that this House has not the power to punish for contempt committed pending an impeachment proceeding or an inquiry into the facts upon which impeachment shall be tried and determined.

It is true, it is said by the Supreme Court, there is no express grant of power in the Constitution either to the House, the Senate, or the Supreme Court to punish for contempt, but the answer that that affords is no reason why the power does not exist. You are dealing with the House or the Senate or the Supreme Court as the authority of last resort upon this question.

No one denies that in the court order must be maintained; its decrees and its mandates must be obeyed lest law and order perish. Or can anyone deny that this House has the power to suppress disorder in the galleries that would interfere with its procedure, or to perform any other act in its own self-defense for the purpose of carrying into execution those powers that are expressly granted to it under the Constitution? You have the implied and inherent power therefore to punish one who would attempt to obstruct your processes, one who would disobey your mandates, providing you are acting within the scope of your authority. This is not an unsettled question.

I was about to read the opinion of the court, but it is hardly necessary in the presence of this intelligent body. This House is familiar with the case cited in the report of Anderson against Dunn in the Supreme Court of the United States, Sixth Wheaton, in which that great tribunal held that the power is in Congress to punish for contempt, notwithstanding there is no grant expressly given in the Constitution. It is inherent in this or other legislative bodies for its self-defense and protection. Without it the people you have been chosen to serve could not be served, and if the power exists to punish for contempt in the presence of a body, it follows logically that any contempt of this House committed beyond and outside of its presence is equally a contempt of the body and equally subject to punishment whether, as Mr. Justice Johnson says, it be committed in Maine or in Louisiana.

What is a contempt of the House or a breach of its privileges? Any word, act, or publication that tends to bring into ridicule and contempt this body or to diminish in any way its power and retard or injuriously affect its proceedings, which you are authorized to uphold for the safety, honor, and dignity of the country, is a contempt. It is a contempt to strike one of your Members for words uttered on the floor of this House, even after the expiration of the Congress in which they were uttered. It is a contempt to offer to bribe a Representative. It is a contempt for a newspaper to publish falsely secrets of the records or Journals of the House or the Senate, as determined by the Senate of the United States in the case of Duane, and may be punished by imprisonment for a violation of the privilege. So powerful is the House and the Senate, indeed, in this matter that, although it has no power to punish beyond the day of its duration as a body—the biennial termination of Congress—yet in the Duane case, when the Senate was about to adjourn, when it happened that the punishment that ought to have been inflicted could not be sufficient within the limitations of the Congress, the Senate agreed and recommended to the President the punishment of this man through the courts, and the courts did punish him by imprisonment for two months, I believe, in the common jail.

Now I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would like to know—there was some confusion here, and I did not exactly catch the remark—whether or not the Senate punished Duane.

Mr. MOON. The Senate agreed to punish Duane, but because the Senate was about to adjourn, and its power under the law was not sufficient to go beyond the date of its sitting, it referred the question to the President, with the request that Duane be brought before the court and be punished for the offense, and that was done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. So, then, as I understand from the gentleman, the punishment inflicted upon Duane was done by the judicial department of the Government and not by the political department of the Government—the Senate?

Mr. MOON. The gentleman can not think for a moment there is any logic in that position that because the judiciary did make the punishment there is no power in the legislative branch to make it, because it was expressly stated the reason the legislative branch, the Senate, did not inflict the punishment was because its life was not long enough to enable it to do so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was not arguing the question with the gentleman, I simply wanted the facts of the case, and that was the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has gotten the facts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not know whether I have or not.

Mr. MOON. Well, if the gentleman thinks he has not gotten the facts it is because he did not understand them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the power to punish is complete for the offense outside of the House. There is one limitation upon that power, and I do not desire to discuss this question or conceal for a single moment any point that might possibly be raised in extenuation of the offense of this man or any bar of the judgment of the House upon the facts.

While the power of the Congress is complete, while its jurisdiction is exclusive, while it has authority to impeach and to punish for contempt pending an impeachment, it is equally true that in the exercise of the power and the privileges that are given to this House, if they are exercised in violation of the law and the orderly procedure, a judgment of conviction and punishment can not be predicated upon it. For instance, if the committee had gone to New York and were acting within the scope and power and authority that were conferred upon it by Congress, and the presumption is that it was, and if the offense of contempt is held to be complete against him, then there is no reason why this House might not proceed to properly adjudge the case. But if that committee in the discharge of their duty went outside of their power and authority that was conferred upon them, if they used their power for another purpose, then that protection that goes with the committee in the discharge of its duties in exercising the powers and functions of this House no longer obtains.

For instance, as held in the case of Thompson against Kilbourne, if the committee sought to investigate the private concerns of a witness before it, and the witness refused to divulge his private secrets, and the committee arrested him for contempt, and the House arraigned him for contempt, it was properly held, in my judgment, that the warrant of arrest of the Sergeant at Arms was no protection, because the jurisdictional fact, the supreme fact upon which the proposition fundamentally rested, was removed. But the facts in this case do not bring it within the scope of Thompson against Kilbourne, nor is that case in any sense a limitation upon the case of Anderson against Dunn, except as I have expressed it and as it has been held by the court.

What was this committee doing in New York? It was undertaking to determine whether the indictment had been found against citizens without proof and by coercion on the part of the district attorney. That was the very thing they were doing. They had before them grand jurors, they had sought to get the minutes, and here the district attorney, who is charged with this tyranny, refuses to aid the committee in their investigation, but seeks to retard the prosecution of the inquiry in various ways. Not only were they within the limit of the power conferred but they were within the technical exercise of that power.

Now, before discussing this letter, which I shall refer to in a few moments, I want to refer to some facts that indicate the state of mind, the malice, of Mr. Marshall. Here is what he said: He says that he had an arrangement with this committee that they would not undertake to force the minutes of the grand jury. He speaks of CARLIN and GARD and NELSON as though they were outlaws and bandits sent for the purpose of exploiting and ruining him in the discharge of his duty. I desire to pass no undue or unjustified encomium upon any man, but for probity of character and for honor and intelligence you will search this House in vain to find three better men than CARLIN, GARD, and NELSON. [Applause.] What does he say? He says:

> Relying on the promise which, as I was thus informed, Mr. CARLIN had made to the district attorney, I did not take the steps which I should otherwise have taken to prevent the subcommittee from taking the course of conduct which they afterwards saw fit to take.

Ah, indeed. He had been there. He had made publications. He had had his assistants obstructing as he could the course of these proceedings. He had done all he could, but he advises at last that if he had known certain things he would have prevented this committee from taking the course it saw fit. What course? The ascertainment of the facts to determine whether he himself was guilty of tyranny and oppression in office or not.

It is with a great deal of unction and pleasure that this distinguished gentleman tells you that there are men in this House who properly ought to be indicted for crimes and that he is not to be deterred by any resolution. Do not forget, gentlemen, that the efforts that he made, that he undertook to pursue, of finding an indictment against Mr. BUCHANAN and others were after and not before Mr. Marshall was impeached. He charges the House, too, with answering an indictment against one of its Members by an impeachment. The RECORD shows that the impeachment was on the 14th of December, while the indictment was on the 28th. May it not be replied, then, that Mr. Marshall sought to answer the charge of impeachment of this House by an indictment of a Representative who preferred the impeachment?

But I must not take up too much of your time. Let me read to you again. What was the state of mind of this gentleman? This is in his written communication to the subcommittee:

> I do not deny that my letter of March 4, 1916, was written while I was in a state of intense and violent indignation at the treatment to which I and my assistants had been subjected. I have thought it over in cooler moments since writing it, and I find in it nothing to regret and nothing to retract. There is not a word in it which is not true. Under the same circumstances I should write the same letter again, and it is my honest opinion that any investigation by Congress should be rather into the actions of the subcommittee which sought to bring public disgrace upon my assistants and myself than into my own resentment of their methods.

Is there anything that could be more defiant than that statement? But he claims that his action was not directed against the Congress, and that his letter was against the subcommittee. That is a weak subterfuge, one not worthy of a man who would assert such bravery and martyrdom for a cause as he does. He seeks to shield himself behind the simple suggestion that a committee of the House may be entirely separated from the House, that the House ought not to and could not follow the committee with its power and authority in the exercise of its mandates and the performance of its duty.

Why, you could not go as 440 men to New York. You had to send your committee. The committee acted within its power and had the protection of this body.

But the gentleman while making that claim unfortunately makes some admissions that are not in his favor.

I will not take time to look through the record. You will find it printed there. Mr. Marshall is asked if, in the calm consideration of all the facts, after the hour of tumult, when his anger was gone, he did not want to modify the statements against this committee, and he answered that he did not.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not on page 75, at the top of the page?

Mr. MOON. That is not just what I had in mind. He reiterates the same thing there. He is asked again, as you will see, "Do you desire to be understood as making no apology or retraction?" "I do." Again: "Mr. Marshall, knowing, as you do now, that this committee was acting within its authority and that it represented the House itself, are you ready to say that you have no apology?" "I am." That is the substance of it. Now, look at it for a moment. In his anxiety to play the martyr he abandons for the moment the charge that the committee was derelict and dishonorable in the performance of its duty, but he affirms the objection, the contempt, and the defamation that he has made of this House itself.

Gentlemen, that brings us to the only question involved, because these questions of law that we have presented are all settled. They are conclusive. The jurisdiction and the power of this House is complete. Notwithstanding the power of the House in these matters, notwithstanding the acts of this defendant outside of this letter, we are without authority to punish him until we ourselves conclude that the language contained in this letter is a breach of the privileges of the House, and therefore a contempt, and this House alone is the forum in which the question can be determined. The Constitution, as I observed before, does not give the express grant of power even to punish for contempt. The power is implied and inherent in every legislative body. Of course there could be no enumeration of the things that constitute contempt. When a charge of contempt is made the House must decide whether the fact constituted a breach of its privileges, and therefore a contempt, and that depends always upon the judgment of the House on the specific facts.

If the House has been driven and buffeted about, if it has submitted to every sort of insult, if it has permitted its power to be called in question without an effort to maintain it, if it has permitted its honor to be impugned without the punishment of the criminal, it may be prepared to accept and approve something like this letter; but I conceive that a body of men, high-minded and honorable, are not undertaking to punish any man for what is said about them individually, but because of scandalous and defamatory declarations against them as the representatives of the people; not because it impugns their powers in any way, but because it is a direct thrust at the sovereignty of the people who elect them.

Let us see, then, if this article is a contempt. Remember the circumstances under which it was written. He says:

> You are exploiting charges against me of oppressive conduct toward a Member of your honorable body, who is charged with a violation of law—

And so on.

> I may be able to lighten your labors by offering to resign if you can give anything I ever did that remotely approximates the lawless tyranny of your order of arrest of Mr. Holme.

Mr. Holme was a newspaper man. The proof shows that he had published the statement that the office of the district attorney, Mr. Marshall, was asserting that Congress proposed to impeach him in order to prevent the punishment of those who were charged with conspiracy to violate the interstate and foreign commerce laws; in other words, definitely charging in so many words pro-German affiliations on the part of this House.

Well, that was properly a subject of inquiry, was it not? If this committee, charged by this House with its authority, had gone there to ascertain the facts, it had a right to know upon what basis it was charged that this House, in the interest of German supremacy, was proposing to punish a district attorney because he had indicted a Member of this House who was alleged to be a violator of the law to prevent conspiracies against and in restraint of interstate and foreign commerce. What does all that mean? Analyze it a moment. It means that a Member of this House, in the opinion of Mr. Marshall, is guilty of a high crime, and that in order to protect and shield him from the consequences of that crime this House of Representatives lent itself as particeps criminis to an offense by one of its Members and sought to impeach the district attorney. Ah, does not that offend your dignity? Are you ready to approve the suggestion that that statement is true? Are you ready to say that your committee was beyond the scope of its power and authority when it assumed to investigate and determine that fact?

But here came one after another of the grand jurors who sat upon those cases, and they were heard. Was not that in the performance of the duty of the committee? And let me observe that it is not material whether that testimony tended to implicate Mr. Marshall or not. It is utterly immaterial whether he is guilty or not guilty on the impeachment charge. This committee was not there to determine his guilt or his innocence until all of the facts had been heard and reported. Ah, he says, but you are sent here to exploit me and my office, and ruin me. Who sent them? The House. Did you send them to exploit him and ruin him in his office? If you did, it would be very unjust for you to punish him for contempt. If you did not, let him answer for his calumny. When he spoke against this committee he spoke against the House as equally as when he spoke directly against the House, and he did both in this communication.

But it is said by him that your investigation was not conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate him or any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your body. Think of it! You did not send them there in good faith to investigate his tyranny and his usurpation in office, but because one of your body had been indicted by him, and that, too, after he had been impeached, you sent the committee there to exploit and injure him. Could there be a more gross affront?

Again, he says you employed every rogue that you could find to establish a case against him. This record shows that some of the best and most distinguished people in New York testified. Evidently some men did testify there whom Mr. Marshall did not regard as honorable, because he had been engaged against them in proceedings for conduct which he denounced as dishonorable. But to say that you were particeps criminis in an act that would be treason against your country, and that through your committee you came there to establish facts and to convict him out of the mouths of thieves and rogues—to what extent does your crime go if you are guilty as this man charges?

But, Mr. Speaker, while this record is replete with circumstances that show his contempt and his malignity, it is not necessary I take it for me to go further in a review of these facts.

Who, sir, is this man? Is he an unlettered man; is he an ignorant man who yields to strong passions, stimulated by malignity and intolerant egotism? Is he one who is not known to society? Is he one who does not know the law? Is his reason dethroned? Nay, nay. He is a man of gentle birth, of honorable lineage, who has been given the advantage of all that wealth and society can give; an accomplished lawyer, chosen for his probity and his intelligence to represent the Government of the United States in the suppression of crime and the protection of innocence. He is clothed with a part of the sovereignty of this great people; he administers at altars of justice. Can he be permitted to escape because he was ignorant of the law under which he was acting, even though ignorance of the law itself was an excuse? No; this man can not plead that he was weak of mind; he is chosen for this great office for his intelligence. I do not insist that he has been guilty of any crime comparable in degree to the crime of larceny or murder, because what he has done does not involve in any special sense moral turpitude; but he is guilty of a crime that goes right down to the roots of society and government and seeks its upheaval and its overthrow. We live, breathe, and have our existence only by virtue of law and by virtue of its enforcement, its simplicity, and its purity, and when one is chosen by the highest power of this Government to enforce the law in high places, and he places the foot of the tyrant on the neck of the common citizen he is indeed a greater malefactor than a common criminal and should be punished accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, that there is no proceeding known to the history of jurisprudence for the protection of the rights of the people so beautiful in its solemnity, so simple in its process, so grand in its justice, and so supreme in the interest of the people in the final decree, as the proceeding of impeachment against a public officer.

Sir, from the very moment that a Representative in this House rises in his place and upon his authority alone impeaches a public officer of high crimes and misdemeanors, to the hour of final judgment in the Senate, it is supremely grand and beautiful. No man who is innocent can possibly suffer under it, and no man who is guilty can scarcely escape.

The House proceeding under impeachment is a most orderly one. It directs an inquiry, report is made on the testimony of witnesses, and then in solemn form—if it is believed that the offender, the officer of the Government, is guilty—a resolution is passed and articles of impeachment are preferred and he is haled to the Senate of the Republic and there before that august body, presided over by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of this Nation, his case is investigated, he is given the benefit of counsel and witnesses and all the privileges granted in a highly civilized and humane tribunal.

Could not this man await the determination of that question at some stage of this proceeding in which he would essentially be protected? He was not willing to trust the law, but vain, egotistical, and arrogant, he assumed unto himself supremacy over the law, and asserted his contempt of one of the greatest legislative bodies known to the history of government. Shall this man be punished? Shall this resolution be passed? On your votes depend the honor of this body. If, indeed, you be guilty as charged by this public official, if you are unwilling to stand by the rights of the citizen against the oppressor, then you will be his apologist and sanction his crime; but if you are conscious of your dignity and honor, my judgment is that you will pass the pending resolution and call him to answer at the bar of justice. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 15, 1916:

H. R. 529. An act creating an additional land district in the State of California, and for other purposes;

H. R. 755. An act to incorporate the Boy Scouts of America, and for other purposes;

H. R. 2744. An act to correct title to certain lands in Colorado;

H. R. 3794. An act for the relief of Thomas S. Johnson;

H. R. 4297. An act for the relief of Frances L. Llewellyn;

H. R. 7804. An act to authorize the issuance of patent to Oscar R. Howard, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 7817. An act to validate the homestead entry of George S. Clark.

On June 16, 1916:

S. 4506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;

S. 5274. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii amending the franchise held by the Hawaiian Electric Co. (Ltd.) by extending it to include all of the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii;

S. 5658. An act to ratify, approve, and confirm an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii amending the franchise held by the Honolulu Gas Co. (Ltd.) by extending it to include all of the island of Oahu, Territory of Hawaii;

S. 5776. An act to amend certain public-utility company franchises in the Territory of Hawaii; and

S. 5708. An act for the establishment of Winston-Salem, in the State of North Carolina, as a port of delivery under the act of June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

On June 19, 1916:

H. R. 13064. An act for the relief of M. A. Sweeney Shipyards & Foundry Co.

RICARDO DE BORJA (H. DOC. NO. 1229).

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. Ricardo de Borja, a citizen of Ecuador, to receive instuction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Ecuador.

The Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Ecuador, and that it would follow established precedent.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, when I came into the House this morning I had no intention of speaking upon this question. While sitting here listening to what was said, and I regret that in my position I could not hear all of the remarks of the chairman of the committee, a feeling has grown within me which prompts me to say a few words.

I do not think that the House has had a more serious or more important question before it than this for many days. I personally come to the consideration of the question without a particle of feeling with respect to it. I know one of the men interested in it as a fellow Member of the House. I have not a personal acquaintaince with Mr. Marshall, the district attorney of New York, although I know his general reputation in the community, practicing as I do somewhat in the courts of the city of New York.

When this matter first came before the Judiciary Committee, irrespective of personalities, but as a Congressman and a lawyer and a patriot, I said to myself this is a mistaken proceeding. The high court of impeachment is not to be convened on every trivial occasion. The great power of removal that rests in this body is not to be called into existence to remove a fourth-class postmaster or even a district attorney. A mistake has been made in this proceeding in beginning it.

I reflected upon the question, What is the purpose of impeachment? Impeachment is a plan devised to remove from office. It is not a proceeding for punishment. The purpose is to remove from office, and those of you who have read the debates with respect to this subject of impeachment, when our great Constitution was adopted, will recognize that what those men had in mind was to prevent an Executive possessing such high authority from usurping power and defying the will of the people by making him subject to impeachment.

By exact words in your Constitution it is written that the President and the Vice President shall be subject to impeachment; otherwise good authorities hold they would not have been. A case exists which establishes the theory that a Senator of the United States is not within the impeachment article. The decision of a distinguished Attorney General is in your Hinds' Precedents to the effect that a Territorial judge appointed by the President, confirmed by the Senate, is not within the impeachment clause of the Constitution. The language of the Constitution, I admit, is apparently broad enough to cover the removal of any civil officer, the word "civil" separating military officials. But no language of that kind is ever used or put in operation unless one thinks of the object and purpose to be gained by its application, and the object of impeachment being removal from office, the question is whether or not that object does not limit and save this House from what might be cast upon it any day, namely, the duty of trying a fourth-class postmaster by impeachment and removing him from office? It seems to me that it is like training an enormous gun to kill a rabbit. The power of impeachment is a great power. It is a power that ought to be conserved and preserved for those uses for which it was originally destined; and when I reflect upon this procedure that a gentleman under prosecution rises in his place in this House and simply says by his ipse dixit, "I impeach my prosecutor," I ask myself the question, Is the remedy or defense against a criminal charge impeachment of that prosecutor? As Mr. Marshall puts it in his statement before the committee, shall the defense of impeachment be written into the administration of the criminal laws of the United States of America? I hope not.

The course that I would have pursued—and I say it with all respect to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]—is this: I would not have risen in my place and said, "I impeach my prosecutor." I would have said, "Mr. Prosecutor, you are persecuting an innocent man. I demand a trial by my peers in the usual course of the law of the land, and I will stand and meet it." [Applause.] And then, when that had transpired, if this prosecutor had shown malevolence or ill will, I would adopt the other remedies. But, my friends, we have not yet reached this use of the remedy by impeachment. This is a removable office. When you trace the history of the district attorney's office you will find that, except as disturbed by the tenure-of-office acts passed in the heated period succeeding the war, he was unquestionably removable from his office by the President of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that his appointment must be confirmed by the Senate; but we are relieved of all doubt upon that question, for Congress in its wisdom has written into the statutes of your country a provision which says that the district attorney may be removed at the pleasure of the President.

Where is the necessity, then, for invoking impeachment proceedings? What ought to be the remedy of a man who had been injured by an improper prosecution? To apply, first, to the district attorney's superior officer, the Attorney General of the United States. Denied justice there, then appeal to the President; and surely he would not have been denied justice at the hands of his own Executive, who could have removed him from the office on the testimony he might produce, if it warranted it.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not just yet.

Then, if denied justice by the President, he still had the final remedy—by impeachment, perhaps—for then would exist a case in which, perhaps, resort might be made, in the last event, to charges before this body and to an impeachment. But, my friends, not even to remedy a personal wrong, or a personal indignity to him, should that impeachment be allowed by this House. It must be a wrong that affects the public through the administration of his office, so that the public is injured. The redress for a personal injury or grievance, as you lawyers who are here all know, lies in the courts of your States and the United States through the remedies which State laws as well as United States laws have provided. So that here was a step taken to impeach before there was a complaint made to either the Attorney General or to the President to remove this official if he was guilty of misconduct that warranted removal from office and you were asked, and did step in, and before a trial on the charge made against the accusing Member, impeach and put on trial the man who is prosecuting him. I read in the papers a statement, I presume, uttered by him, a statement to this effect from the distinguished chief justice of the Court of Appeals of New York, Mr. Justice Lacombe, who is now retired—a man for whom I have the greatest respect, and whose opinions carry weight and power with them. In a most deprecatory, mild way, without offense to anyone, he said that which is a great and mighty truth, which we ought not to forget. He said:

> It is to be deplored that an investigation of this kind should have been inaugurated by the Congress of the United States, by a man who, though he be innocent—and I have no reason to believe that he is not—is accused of a crime, and thereby a proceeding started which is calculated to intimidate any honorable and honest district attorney who may desire to do his duty.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. GRAHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GORDON. I would like to have the gentleman, who is a very distinguished lawyer, state what this House could have done other than it did do upon the impeachment of Mr. Marshall?

Mr. GRAHAM. I am coming to that in a moment. I am trying now, even at the expense of your patience, to give a bird's-eye view, for one can not argue a question like this in the time allotted and without authorities—I am giving you a bird's-eye view of the situation. When this came before the Committee on the Judiciary, what was done? I agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] that once the statement was made that impeachment was offered, the House ought to appoint a committee and make an investigation. That is quite true, and I wish it distinctly understood that I am not here saying one word in opposition to this special committee or the work that it has done, for in their line of duty there was nothing left for them to do as the servants and agents of the House. Neither am I here to say anything that would hurt or wound the feelings of the gentlemen of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee who acted in this investigation on the charges that were made. I wish to say of all of them they have my respect and personal regard and in many cases an affection that is deep, and therefore you may imagine with what hesitation I take this position when it is only from my sense of duty that I lift up my voice and speak at this time upon this question.

Mr. DALE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. DALE of New York. The gentleman has made reference to a statement made by former Justice Lacombe. I desire to ask the gentleman now if he has any knowledge as to the attitude of the Bar Association of the city of New York in reference to this so-called Marshall matter?

Mr. GRAHAM. I have. I understand that they feel very indignant over the course of procedure from the public viewpoint, but I do not attach much importance to that, for the reason that we lawyers generally stand together in legal procedure and everything of that sort [laughter and applause], and that is the trouble with us here. [Applause.] The gentleman from Illinois is a Congressman, and we stood together as Congressmen and put this measure through, and it went ahead, and I verily submit that if he had not been behind it it never would have been heard of. It was his personality that gave it life and put it on its course.

Now, my purpose is to lead up to this thought. A subcommittee was appointed, and that committee commenced its investigation and it carried it on here in the city of Washington, and finally determined to go to the city of New York to take further testimony. And it was an unfortunate decision that caused them to go the city of New York; that, I think, was the beginning on their part of the commission of the errors which, in my judgment, are the excuse for what Mr. Marshall wrote.

Now, I ask you to remember, first, that to the eye of Mr. Marshall looking at this matter there was presented this anomalous proceeding of an accused person turning about and indicting a prosecuting officer without recourse having first been made to the official above that prosecutor, or to the President, who was clothed with the full power of removal. Now, that is the first thing which, I say, would create suspicion in your mind or in the mind of any man who stood in Mr. Marshall's place as a prosecuting officer. The second was that when these proceedings were carried on in the city of New York two things transpired that I think were wrong. No doubt the subcommittee felt itself justified in adopting the course of holding open meetings. No doubt they felt themselves justified in calling the grand jurors before them for examination, but I respectfully submit that in both they erred, for when the public hearing was had the Rae Tanzers and the other people who were witnesses came on the stand and testified, and all this was published in the papers without Mr. Marshall having a chance to reply or say a word. It was stimulating indignation; it was calculated to create anger. Then when he saw how this subcommittee questioned grand jurors, although it was composed of lawyers—every man here knows what a grand juror's oath is when he swears that he will maintain secret and inviolate his own and his fellow's counsels and all that transpired in the grand jury room. Who clothed a committee of Congress with power to ask a man to violate his oath? Who clothed this subcommittee with power to penetrate the grand jury room and to make them reveal how and why they voted? Take the record of the hearing, take the record and read the questions addressed to the grand jurors when they were put under oath. Why did you indict A and did not indict B? What evidence did you have to act upon C, and why did you not bring anything against D? If ever there was an invasion of the plainest principles of justice and correct procedure, it occurred then. Here was Mr. Marshall, who had done what he conceived to be his duty, sitting in his office observing the subcommittee invite—I will not say invite—but call anybody whose name was suggested to them by those who were complaining against the prosecutor, and Mr. Marshall saw one here and another there who was accused of crime rise up and another who had been tainted in some other way rise up—and they told their story and it was published against him to the world. I have been a district attorney; I have felt the sting of criticism upon occasion. I know what it is for a man who is as finely constituted and sensitive as this man is, who comes of well-recognized southern blood, who has a keen sense of honor and of his character rights, and I can conceive of his indignation waxing hotter and hotter until finally it burst forth in this criticism of the subcommittee.

Remember, gentlemen, there can be no allegations here of a criticism of the House itself, except it is by inference, if you should say that because he criticized the committee he criticized the House. This inference he kills. His second letter reads:

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of March 4, addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee which has recently taken testimony in New York concerning my administration of my office, I notice from the press that some persons appear to have construed my statements as directed toward your honorable committee as a whole. I beg to advise you that the criticisms in that letter were addressed to the methods pursued by the subcommittee. I do not retract nor modify any of those criticisms. But I did not intend (nor do I think my letter should be so construed) to reflect in any way upon the Judiciary Committee, nor did I question the power of the House of Representatives to order such an investigation.

There is the matter presented in its proper relation to the facts. An accusation against a subcommittee, no; not even against them, but their methods; and I want to say to you as fair and manly men did not their methods deserve some degree of criticism even upon our part, who are moved only by friendly feelings, when they departed from the secret hearing and made it public; and then, when these men whom he had prosecuted one after another arose with accusing words in their mouths and he had no chance to prevent their being spread like a poison through the community, and when he saw the secret character of the grand jury invaded and the jurors themselves put on the rack and examined as though they were offenders, why, the language of indignation as writ by his pen in the first letter is such as any manly man with red blood would write. [Applause.]

Do not let us forget, gentlemen, that the power of criticizing a public body is not taken away from the American people. Do not let us forget that while we are sensitive about the dignity of the House and eager to punish somebody for contempt of the House who can not hit back that the right of the American citizen to answer attacks upon him is a sacred and inviolable right. And he wrote it in man fashion. [Applause.] He sent it to the committee, and he said, "I am going to publish it. You have published all this other matter in the papers in New York. I am going to publish this as my answer and my arraignment of your methods." Whoever heard of that becoming a contempt of the House of Representatives? God save the mark whenever it shall be said that the House of Representatives big and great as it is must needs stoop to the passage of such a resolution as this and attempt to punish a man simply because in his honesty and indignation he resented an attack that he considered to be unjust and improper upon him. [Applause.]

Now, I ask you——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM. I read recently a book which had the title "Put Yourself in His Place," a most instructive and illuminating book. If we could only put ourselves in his place, we would not regard this question of contempt as so serious. I am not finding fault with the committee that passed upon this. I do not defend the language that Mr. Marshall used. I admit that there are passages in it which if there can be conviction for contempt under the law at all might be considered as contemptuous. But remember also that letter is written to the committee. Why was it written?

The chivalry of the man comes out. A newspaper man has been arrested. The committee disclaims having made any arrest, but the assistant with the committee took him to the United States marshal, and the United States marshal refused to receive him without a commitment. If that is not an arrest, I do not know what it is. It may have been an illegal one, but, as a fact, it was an arrest. Here comes the chivalry of the man. He will not permit that newspaper man, who refused to answer whence he got his information, to suffer because of him. He writes this letter, and we must read the letter in that light to explain the effect of what he said, for it is largely a recital of an interview with the newspaper man. The sentence that is regarded, I think, in this letter as the most severe and improper is this:

I said that your whole proceeding here was irregular and extraordinary.

Was not that true?

That I had never heard of such conduct of an impeachment proceeding.

Did you?

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; not now. He said:

That charges of this sort were not usually heard in public until the House of Representatives had considered them and were willing to stand back of them. I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, had come here and had held public hearings; that among your witnesses you had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistant under the full privilege of testifying before a congressional committee.

There is language in that which he might have omitted, but it was the language of indignation and anger.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if in reading he did not omit the first paragraph of the letter, stating what he told to the committee. I think the gentleman ought to put that before the House in connection with the other statement.

Mr. GRAHAM. Touching the thought that I have quoted unfairly from anything in reading the letter, I resent. I was not attempting to read the whole letter. It is before every Member of Congress, but I was referring to those things that I have justified from the record.

I have said that he might have said them in less harsh language.

Mr. GARNER. He said:

What I told him was about as follows: I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith.

Now, will you explain that portion of it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir; I was coming to that. I was looking for it while I was talking. I wish to refer to that quotation in my references to the letter.

Mr. GARNER. Let me read all the paragraph:

But was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

What was the purpose of this committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. There is no one who will accuse the committee of having that purpose that knows the committee, and I do not so accuse them. I might say that honestly, fully, and fairly, there is not a man on that committee that would do that. I mean to say this. This, however, was expressing what his judgment of these unusual facts were, to the reporter, and I say to you, with all respect, that I know that you would have said the same things, and perhaps a lot more, with your fiery blood and disposition, if you had been in his place. [Applause.] And so would I. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. GRAHAM. Now, that is the worst part of that letter. I intended to refer to it and was looking for it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. GRAHAM. I will.

Mr. GARNER. If I understand the gentleman's contention, it is that he, Marshall, in making these remarks that I have just referred to, did not contemplate the purpose of the committee?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARNER. And their action?

Mr. GRAHAM. He attacked the actions.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman permit just another reading of that letter to controvert that viewpoint, and let me say to the gentleman that it completely changed my view of the situation. At first I was inclined to look at the case as he does.

Mr. GRAHAM. If it is not counted out of my time, I will yield. If it is, I must decline.

Mr. GARNER. I will give you more time if it is necessary.

Mr. TAGGART. May I ask a question now?

Mr. GRAHAM. No. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has the right to have his interrogatory finished. If he has something that answers me, he has a right to show it.

Mr. GARNER. Let me say that when I was a member of this subcommittee I had the same viewpoint as the gentleman, but in view of what has occurred I had to come back to the House and present a different view. I refer the gentleman to page 5 of this report:

I told him that you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with BUCHANAN'S counsel.

Now, if it is an "alleged" investigation, how does the gentleman explain it not being a real investigation?

Mr. GRAHAM. Now, if we are going to try to split a shadow, then that is a criticism. He said it was an alleged investigation. He, as he said before in the letter, believed it to be a deliberate attempt to help BUCHANAN.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. What does the gentleman mean when he says it is an attempt on the part of this House to intimidate district attorneys? I presume there are other district attorneys of warm blood whose duty it may be to prosecute Members of Congress.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman show me where he says that? That is not in the letter.

Mr. TAGGART. Why, he said the object was to intimidate them.

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman is talking about the examination of Mr. Marshall before the other committee.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman just read it.

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I did not.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman just said it.

Mr. GRAHAM. No. That is in his examination, and not in this letter. He is on trial for the letter.

Mr. TAGGART. Now, let me read the letter to you.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I will not yield to the gentleman any further, because I have not the time.

Mr. TAGGART. Well, it is in the letter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PARK. In what the gentleman stated about the oath of a grand juror, did the gentleman intend to exclude or eliminate a portion of that oath when he quoted it?

Mr. GRAHAM. I only quoted it roughly.

Mr. PARK. I understand that, but there is an exception, as I understand, which provides that a grand juror may, under certain circumstances, before a court of competent jurisdiction, disclose what happened in the grand jury room.

Mr. GRAHAM. In the first place there was no court of competent jurisdiction here.

Mr. PARK. The gentleman does not consider that the subcommittee had the right conferred upon it by the House?

Mr. GRAHAM. And there is nothing of that kind in the grand juror's oath, and gentlemen of the bar realize that the proceedings before a grand jury are secret, and particularly what they say and do amongst themselves; and what reason they have for voting for one thing or against another are their sacred possessions and there is no power yet devised on earth that can legally take from them anything that is thus committed within the walls of that secret room. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PARK. There is an exception, however.

Mr. TAGGART. Now, in the interest of the RECORD, will the gentleman have this read from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I have only two minutes left. I want to sum up my position in this way. I do not want any controversy with anybody about facts, except where there is a clear mistake. The mere effort to interpret a word one way or the other is not an answer to me, nor does it show that I have made a misquotation of anything that is in the text. I have not misquoted anything. But I put it up to you, put yourselves in his place and say whether you would not have acted as he did. And was not this the language of a man justly indignant about what he conceived to be a great and grave wrong?

Ah, but say our friends, once an impeachment is started, nothing can stop it. What nonsense. This House is the party injured, if injury there has been. A man who is injured can forgive. A man who thinks there is a wrong done hastily can overlook it. The process here is to punish for an attack upon the House. The House is strong enough, big enough, and capable enough to forget it, and lay this motion upon the table. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, how much of our time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed 40 minutes.

Mr. STERLING. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, this is a New York City case, and being a New York case, and a Democratic one at that, the country sees the spectacle of Republicans having to defend the Democratic United States district attorney for the southern district of New York.

I have been a member of the United States district court bar for the southern district of New York for 14 years. I received the thanks of the United States district court for that district for successful work done in a fraudulent bankruptcy case. And when one tells you that men will not come and make many disparaging remarks against you when you are prosecuting them, you are making one of the greatest mistakes or errors that can be made.

Now, I respect the bar of New York. I respect ex-United States Attorney General George W. Wickersham. And when he, as president of the bar association, sends to the Speaker of this House a report, I think that it should receive the most earnest, thorough, and serious consideration at our hands. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY 1, 1916.

To the SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: By vote of the executive committee of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, the attention of the House of Representatives is respectfully invited to one phase of the proceedings pending against H. Snowden Marshall, United States attorney for the southern district of New York, for an alleged violation of the privileges of the House of Representatives which, from the reported proceedings, appears not to have been specifically brought to the attention of the House, but which has excited the most widespread concern not only among the members of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York but among the whole body of the bar.

In order to make entirely clear the reasons for this concern and not for the purpose of suggesting in any way an interference with proceedings by the House of Representatives deemed by it necessary to the preservation of its dignity or the protection of its privileges or prerogatives, attention is invited to the following facts:

For some days previous to December 14, 1915, it was reported in the newspapers that an investigation was proceeding before the Federal grand jury in the southern district of New York which might result in the indictment of certain Congressmen.

On December 14, 1915, Congressman Frank BUCHANAN, Representative in Congress for the State of Illinois, arose in the House and said that he impeached H. Snowden Marshall, the United States attorney for the southern district of New York, for malfeasance and misfeasance in office.

On December 23, 1915, the grand jury in the United States district court for the southern district of New York found an indictment against the Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN and others for violation of the Federal statute.

On January 12, 1916, Representative BUCHANAN again presented to the House charges, and declared that he impeached Mr. Marshall of high crimes and misdemeanors, and then charged him in vague terms with wrongdoing but with no specific wrongful act.

Thereupon Representative BUCHANAN proposed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of H. Snowden Marshall; whether he has conspired," etc.

The resolution authorized the committee to take testimony and to appoint a subcommittee to act in behalf of the whole committee whenever it was advisable.

Representatives CARLIN, GARD, and NELSON were appointed by the Judiciary Committee of the House as such subcommittee to take testimony.

The subcommittee called before it the members of the grand jury which had indicted Representative BUCHANAN, and asked them about the proceedings before the grand jury during the investigation preceding the indictment and at the time the indictment was voted.

[The questions and answers are included in the letter. They were taken from the official printed report of the hearings before the subcommittee.]

We have not attempted to give the whole colloquy in each case, but merely to indicate the nature of the inquiries. Inquiries of the same general character will be found running all through the testimony of the five witnesses named.

The committee asked Assistant United States Attorney Sarfaty, the attorney who presented the case to the grand jury:

(1) Whether he made an argument before the grand jury. (Rept., pp. 187, 195.)

(2) Whether an investigation was made of Representative BUCHANAN and Messrs. Lamar, Shulteis, Martin, and others by the detective department of district attorney's office. (Rept. p. 187.)

(3) Who were the detectives assigned to this work. (Rept., p. 187.)

(4) Whether any private firm was engaged in the work. (Rept., p. 188.)

(5) Whether any evidence was presented to the grand jury against BUCHANAN. (Rept., pp. 190, 192. 14.)

(6) Who made the complaint and who furnished the information against them to the office of the district attorney. (Rept., pp. 193, 201.)

Mr. Sarfaty declined to answer certain questions on the ground that the United States attorney and the Attorney General had so directed him.

Near the end of his examination one of the subcommittee said to Mr. Sarfaty (Rept., p. 202):

"I want to inquire of you whether you expect to be in New York in the next few days?

"I certainly do.

"Because the committee may have an interesting communication to make to you."

No opinion is here expressed upon the question of whether or not Mr. Marshall's communication of March 4, 1916, to the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary constitutes a breach of the privileges of the House, and it is assumed that that question will be correctly and judicially decided by the House.

What this association desires respectfully to submit to you and the House of Representatives is a consideration of the effect upon the administration of criminal justice of legislative proceeding undertaken at the instance of a Member of Congress indicted, or about to be indicted, in investigating the United States attorney under whose direction the indictment has been or is being prosecuted, before the trial of the Member who has been indicted, and in reference to the very subject matter of the indictment.

The successful working of our system requires that the persons intrusted with power in any one of the three branches of the Government shall not encroach upon the powers confined to the others. Certainly, only alleged offenses of a grave and exceptional character, supported by convincing evidence from responsible sources, should justify an investigation by a legislative body into the conduct of a criminal prosecution of one of its members then pending undetermined in a court of justice.

The Constitution, in section 6 of Article I, grants to Members of Congress privilege "from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same."

Even this privilege does not apply in cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace. A Member of Congress has no rights when the criminal law has been set in operation against him to which the humblest citizen is not entitled, except those established for the benefit of the legislative body of which he is a member, rather than for him.

This question vitally concerns the impartial administration of justice and appears to be of much greater importance than the form of the criticism expressed by an official or any person concerning the procedure of the subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary. This important question appears to have been overlooked by all committees of the House of Representatives dealing with the charges against United States Attorney Marshall, and for that reason this association begs respectfully its careful consideration by the House before action is taken on the charges against Mr. Marshall of improper criticism of the subcommittee, which is asserted to constitute a breach of the privileges of the House.

Respectfully, GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM, President.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman answer a question right there?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Have the doctors of New York City provided you with any advice to the House of Representatives, in addition to this?

Mr. SIEGEL. Let me say to the gentleman that I do not take the advice of the doctors or the lawyers alone, but I take the advice of what is the consensus of opinion of the people of New York as to what is the real issue in this case, and particularly so when the view coincides with my decision, after weighing all the facts.

Mr. TAGGART. Did any other association there besides this furnish us with any instructions?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will say to the gentleman that I have not the time to go into any long story as to what instruction he needs. I leave it to the press of New York, which has placed itself on record in favor of the present United States district attorney. The press there, Republican as well as Democratic, and the independent press as well, are for him. I would suggest that the gentleman read the editorials in question.

Mr. DALE of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. DALE of New York. Is it a fact that the action of the bar association, as referred to in the newspaper article just read by the clerk, was taken subsequent to the time that the New York World, a very prominent paper in the city of New York, editorially and otherwise, criticized the House for taking this action relative to Mr. Marshall?

Mr. SIEGEL. To be frank with the gentleman, I will say that it had been generally heard in New York City that the bar association had been investigating the entire situation. The newspapers of New York are all of one opinion in regard to this whole proposition.

Mr. DALE of New York. One more question. When you say that all of the papers of the city of New York are of one opinion, you mean the Democratic papers and the Republican papers, do you not?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes; I refer to them regardless of party, but also independent papers as well. Now, what is the situation? We are talking about contempt here to-day. In New York to-day and for over a week there has been proceeding a trial in the United States district court of a case known all over this land as the Ray Tanzer case. Curiously enough in the New York papers of Sunday appeared a statement that the committee had reached a conclusion that the United States district court of New York had no jurisdiction of the Ray Tanzer case. If that does not constitute contempt by the person who gave the item out I do not know of anything that does. I do not know how the alleged conclusions of the subcommittee got out to the press, but it was published, although the Ray Tanzer case was on trial and unconcluded and although the district attorney was compelled to and did call in special counsel. I say this, although I have no feelings of any kind against Ray Tanzer or any person connected with the various cases that arise out of this case?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. I will yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. SIEGEL. Now, gentlemen, what has been the result? Impeachment charges were filed over five months ago against District Attorney Marshall, and for five months this whole matter has been continuously investigated. No conclusion has been reached by the Judiciary Committee. The subcommittee has taken testimony, and every one of the committee apparently agrees that there is not sufficient evidence or testimony to bring the impeachment to a successful conclusion against the present district attorney. Then in all fairness and frankness, why does not the Judiciary Committee report to the House so that the people of the United States will not be compelled to stand the expense of some one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars for the employment of special attorneys for the various cases that arise out of this case.

Now, there is another point I desire to bring to your attention. It is conceded by all that charging an official with charges of impeachment is charging him with a serious crime. Did you ever hear at any time in any court where the defendant has been punished in the midst of the trial for contempt; and if so, what court on appeal is there in the land that would not reverse the decision where it occurred?

Here you are called upon to determine whether impeachment charges shall lie against this man, and in the midst of it you are urged to punish the defendant for contempt. Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the United States district attorney from New York, and all other district attorneys throughout the United States who are doing their duty fearlessly, courageously, and honestly, we ought not to place ourselves in the position of saying that if any man who is indicted happens to be a Member of this House that he may by merely rising and proposing impeachment charges against his prosecutor, and in that way setting the machinery in motion, for five months and longer prevent his case coming to trial. I say this as a general proposition and without intending to reflect on any particular individual.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Has the gentleman considered the rights and privileges of the Members of the House and the committee that this House sent up to investigate the matter?

Mr. SIEGEL. I have. I want to say that I hold each and every member of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee in the highest esteem and I have reached my conclusions after careful and thorough consideration of all the facts. I believe in years to come they will feel that a wrong impression is being created of a matter that should have been disposed of long ago, one way or the other.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think they are entitled to any consideration on this subject?

Mr. SIEGEL. I think they are entitled to the highest consideration. This committee, however, went to New York for the purpose of taking testimony. Under our State laws the disclosure of grand-jury minutes is strictly prohibited unless the court directs to the contrary. In other words, a defendant makes application to the court for an inspection of the grand-jury minutes and the court in its discretion may in the interest of justice grant such motion. Each grand juror in our State courts takes an oath not to disclose what occurs in the grand-jury room, and if he does he is guilty of a crime under the laws of the State of New York. The penal law of the State of New York on this question reads as follows:

GRAND JUROR DISCLOSING WHAT TRANSPIRED BEFORE THE GRAND JURY.

SEC. 1783. A grand juror who, except when lawfully required by a court or officer, willfully discloses:

1. Any evidence adduced before the grand jury; or
2. Anything which he himself or any other member of the grand jury said, or in what manner he or any other grand juror voted upon any matter before them, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

STENOGRAPHER DISCLOSING EVIDENCE TAKEN BEFORE GRAND JURY.

SEC. 1784. A stenographer appointed to take testimony given before a grand jury, who permits any person other than the district attorney to take a copy of such testimony or of any portion thereof, or to read the same or any portion thereof, except on the written order of the court, is guilty of a misdemeanor.

I am not sure at this time, but I assume that we have a similar United States Statute prohibiting the disclosure of what occurs before the United States grand jury. We are agreed, however, that the United States statutes make no provision for United States judges administering an oath to grand jurors serving in their courts, but that such oath is administered under the common law, or, as some lawyers believe, under the inherent power of the courts. I desire to make these two points clear so as to avoid any confusion that might arise in the minds of laymen that the oath is being administered to grand jurors without some authority. I shall vote in the negative on this resolution not because I do not believe that the subcommittee went to New York to do its duty justly and fairly, but because I feel that far more harm is being done to the administration of justice by the failure to terminate this entire controversy by taking decisive action to-day, and I believe that the best interests of the country will be served by voting against this resolution.

The press of New York and the bar of New York feel that we should terminate this unlimited rancor over this question and save the Treasury of the United States hundreds of thousands of dollars that must be spent for special counsel in the trial of cases pending in the southern district of New York during the time that this question is left open and undecided. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, before I say anything on the main issue I want to say a word on the last sentence that was uttered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] with reference to the minutes of the grand jury under the laws of New York. The gentleman said it was unlawful under the statutes of New York to reveal the secrets of the grand jury. Now, it may be that the State of New York has passed a statute governing the conduct of Federal grand juries, but if it has it is the only State in the Union that has done so. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say to the gentleman that if Mr. Sarfaty had disclosed what took place in the grand-jury room he would have been subject to disbarment. Our State statutes govern where United States statutes do not. By that I mean that State legal procedure is followed.

Mr. LENROOT. I simply wanted to clear up that point in the beginning.

Now, we are very fortunate that this debate confines the real issue within very narrow limits. Mr. Marshall, in testifying before the special committee, has admitted the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee to make the investigation that the House authorized it to make. He has admitted the jurisdiction and authority of the subcommittee created by the Judiciary Committee to make the investigation that they proceeded to make. It has been admitted practically on this floor that the House itself has the power to take the proceeding that is here contemplated, if the facts so justify; in other words, that the House has the power to punish for contempt. This has been settled by the decision in the case of Anderson against Dunn by the Supreme Court in the early history of the Government. But for that decision, I am frank to say, I think it would have been a very open and debatable question as to whether the House of Representatives had the power that is here sought to be exercised.

But that can not be longer open to question, because it has been settled not only by the Supreme Court of the United States but by the long and continued practice of the House and the Senate themselves. So that we are brought down to the issue of whether or not the letter in question written by the district attorney of New York constitutes a contempt of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], we all know, is one of the most distinguished lawyers of this House, and I undertake to say that he made the strongest speech that could be made by any Member of this House in opposition to this resolution. But let us see what the speech of this gentleman was. As I say, he made the best speech possible, but the first half of it was directed to the question of whether or not any proceedings should have been taken by the House under the impeachment made by Mr. BUCHANAN. That part of the speech was a criticism directed against the House itself in the action that it took in authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to proceed as it did proceed, and we have nothing to do with that question now.

The balance of the gentleman's speech was not a defense of Mr. Marshall, not a defense of the letter, not an attempt to show that it did not constitute a contempt, but was in mitigation of the action of Mr. Marshall—an attempt to show that he had great provocation in publishing the letter and saying in the letter the things that he did say, and only in one particular did the gentleman from Pennsylvania urge anything that in any way could constitute a defense of the action of Mr. Marshall, wherein he undertook to show that Mr. Marshall's criticisms and reflections were not upon the members of the subcommittee, but only the methods that were used by that subcommittee. To that I shall refer a little later. So far as this subcommittee is concerned it was an agent of this House. These three members of the subcommittee, sitting in the city of New York, in performing the delegated authority which they were directed to perform, represented the House of Representatives itself, and if there was defamation of that subcommittee it went right through the Judiciary Committee and to the House of Representatives itself, because they represented the House of Representatives under duly constituted authority. Now, as to whether or not this letter of Mr. Marshall did constitute a contempt, I want to read three or four paragraphs:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

Is that a criticism of the methods of this subcommittee? Is that a reflection or not upon the members of this subcommittee themselves? And if it is upon the members, it is a reflection upon the House of Representatives.

We must remember this, that the rule with reference to contempt is the same when applied to the House of Representatives as it is when applied to a court, and I wondered as I listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] in his attempted defense of this letter and his showing of the mitigating circumstances—I wondered if a letter of that kind were addressed to a judge of any court in the United States whether that distinguished gentleman, who has at all times been eager to sustain and uphold the dignity of the courts of the United States, would make the kind of argument that he has made here?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman place a committee making an investigation on the same high plane that a judge stands who is administering a judicial office?

Mr. LENROOT. I certainly do [applause], and in making an investigation of this kind, under duly constituted authority, the committees in performing their duties under the direction of this House occupy as high, as important, and as sacred a position as any official in the land. [Applause.]

I want now to paraphrase that paragraph which I have read for just a moment and see how it would apply if that kind of a letter was addressed to a judge of a United States court. Let us carry it a little further. Suppose our good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] were the judge of the United States court, and some district attorney was upon trial for a criminal offense, and suppose he had been called into that district to try that case, and suppose that judge who was upon trial had addressed to him, sitting as a judge of that court, a letter of this kind, saying to him:

I said that your coming to sit upon the bench in this case was not in good faith but was a deliberate effort to intimidate me in the performance of the duties in my office—

Do you think any judge of any court would sit quietly there and say that that was not contempt of court? Let us go a little further. Mr. Marshall says in his letter:

I told him that you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with BUCHANAN'S counsel, Walsh and David Slade, in constant conference with you. I said that I believed that every word of the evidence, whether in so-called secret sessions or not, had been placed at the disposal of these worthies, and that I would be just as willing to give the grand jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee.

Suppose language of that kind had been addressed to any judge anywhere in America, how long do you think that judge would be before he would hold the man who addressed that language to him guilty of contempt? Let me read another paragraph:

I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant; how you had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered.

You will observe that my good friend Mr. GRAHAM, in his defense of Mr. Marshall, did not quote that paragraph, because even he, with all his astuteness, would not argue that that reflection went only to the methods of the subcommittee. Again, and this is the last one that I am going to quote:

It is amazing to me to think that you supposed that I did not understand what you had been attempting to do during your visit here.

Methods? Is not that the severest kind of a reflection upon the motives of an official body of this House that any man could frame? He continues:

I realized that your effort was to ruin me and my office by publishing with your full approval the complaints of various persons who have run afoul of the criminal law under my administration. Your subcommittee has endeavored by insulting questions to my assistants and others, by giving publicity and countenance to the charges of rascals and by refusing to listen to the truth and refusing to examine public records to which your attention was directed, to publicly disgrace me and my office.

I propose to make this letter public.

And he did. It was published in the newspapers in New York either before or at the time——

Mr. GORDON. Before.

Mr. LENROOT. The evidence shows before it was read by the chairman of the subcommittee, to whom it was addressed.

Now, why did Mr. Marshall make this public in this way? As has been stated, he appeared before our subcommittee and he was asked by the chairman that very question.

Feeling that the committee was hostile, this letter was made public on your part for the purpose of bringing the committee into ridicule and contempt before the people.

Now, remember, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has said that there was only criticism of the methods of this committee and he was asked squarely whether the purpose of the publication of this letter was not to bring this committee into contempt and ridicule before the people, and this is Mr. Marshall's answer:

It is hard for me to analyze my feelings in regard to that. I would not like to say yes or no to that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the issue gets down to this one simple question. No; I want to read one other paragraph of Mr. Marshall's before I get to that. As has been stated, he appeared before our subcommittee, and I assure this House that it was not a pleasure for any member of this subcommittee to perform the duty he was called upon to perform. Mr. Marshall was given every opportunity before that committee to make some explanation or reconsideration of the letter which he had written, and this is what he said before the committee:

I do not deny that my letter of March 4, 1916, was written while I was in a state of intense and violent indignation at the treatment to which I and my assistants had been subjected. I have thought it over in cooler moments since writing it, and I find in it nothing to regret and nothing to retract. There is not a word in it which is not true. Under the same circumstances I should write the same letter again, and it is my honest opinion that any investigation by Congress should be rather into the actions of the subcommittee which sought to bring public disgrace upon my assistants and myself than into my own resentment of their methods.

That is his reply after he had been notified that the House proposed to take notice of the letter that he had written to the subcommittee. He thus fairly stated the issue, and it is the issue that is going to be decided by this House when you vote upon this resolution. He said:

It is my honest opinion that any investigation by Congress should be rather into the actions of the subcommittee than myself.

And when you vote upon this resolution a vote against it means that you believe that the members of this subcommittee are subject to condemnation and that they ought to be investigated, and, indeed, if these three Members are guilty of the things that Mr. Marshall charges them with being guilty of, they not only ought to be investigated but ought to be expelled from the House of Representatives. This is the issue squarely. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that he has the greatest respect for the members of the subcommittee and I do not question it, but if he has he can not defend, as he sought to defend upon this floor, this letter of Mr. Marshall making the most severe strictures upon the members of this committee that the English language could be framed to reflect upon any man.

Now, one criticism that he makes is that this committee called as witnesses rogues, as he terms them. They did, and there is no question about it, but if you will read the record you will find that they did call people before them in New York who were of shady reputation; that is true, but you will also find that Mr. Marshall himself, the district attorney of the southern district of New York, also used some of these same rogues and people of shady reputation to secure convictions in the United States district court of New York for various crimes. It is necessary when people of shady reputations are involved to use them sometimes as witnesses. Why, some of the greatest crimes that have been committed in American history would have forever gone unpunished unless people of criminal character had themselves testified and formed a part or a portion of the link of evidence by which it was possible to secure conviction.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to sum up, I want to say for myself—and I am sure that it is the attitude of every member of this special committee—that we have not the slightest prejudice or bias against Mr. Marshall. We would have preferred to have been able to have made a report to this House that no action should be taken.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Did not we intimate so much to Mr. Marshall when he was before us and we gave him until 2.30 to revise his statements and withdraw them; that we thought it was best for him to do so; and we tried our best to get him to withdraw them so we could make a report in his favor?

Mr. LENROOT. We certainly did, and the action this special committee has taken I submit is the only action that it could take in pursuance of the authority and direction that this committee received from the House. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be recognized?

Mr. MOON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who desires to speak for Mr. Marshall.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is not quite accurate. I do not rise to speak for Mr. Marshall. I rise because of a compelling sense of duty to the House to say what I have to say, and before I proceed I want to say that I was in college with Snowden Marshall 25 years ago. Since then I think I have seen him twice and talked with him about five minutes on each occasion, but not in any way in connection with this. I say this so that any bias or prejudice I may have had from a pleasant college acquaintanceship with him may be discounted by Members.

Having said that, I want to say further that I have read every line of the testimony that was available, not only in the hearings before the subcommittee recently appointed, of which Mr. MOON was chairman, but also all of the printed testimony that was a result of the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee in New York. I do not believe that anybody can read the letter of Snowden Marshall without coming to the conclusion that it ought not to have been written, and that there is no justification for a letter couched in those terms. I can not make that too emphatic. I believe that letter ought not to have been written, and it can not be justified by anything that has occurred. I also believe that it is true that the subcommittee by its conduct of the hearing in New York is subject to criticism, and I say this with all the diffidence and regret that any man who is called upon to speak touching his colleagues, who are my personal friends and whom I admire, can feel. But I do not think the conduct of that investigation in New York was such as to be free from censure. I do not think that censure would warrant the letter that Mr. Marshall wrote. I do not impugn their motives, but the method of directing the examination, the method of examination of witnesses that were members of the grand jury that brought the original indictment, and other incidents which if I had time I could relate, compel me to the belief that they were not entirely free from deserving criticism for the manner of conducting that proceeding.

Now, I believe the highest duty of the House is, of course, to preserve its prestige and its standing before the country, but it can best preserve it by being as critical of itself and its membership as of those who attack it.

I do not believe that the facts in this case, confusing as they are in many particulars, are such as to warrant the proceedings of contempt against Mr. Marshall. And I shall state why.

The gentleman who just preceded me, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], said that if this had happened to a court, could anyone doubt that the court would have immediately punished the offender for contempt? If that happened to be a United States court, I doubt it exceedingly, because I doubt its power, and I want to read to you the statute that was passed by the Congress of the United States in 1831, undertaking to define the power of the courts of the United States to punish for contempt, to show you the rule that we laid down as binding upon the courts themselves, and then to make this suggestion to you, that if that which is still the law is a rule that has the approval of Congress as to the courts, in fairness and candor it is a rule that should apply to us in the exercise of our power to punish for contempt. This is the pertinent portion of section 725 of the Revised Statutes:

> That the power of the several courts of the United States to issue attachments and inflict summary punishment for contempts of court shall not be construed to extend to any cases, except the misbehavior of any person or persons in the presence of the said courts, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of the said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any officer of the said courts, party, juror, witness, or any other person or persons to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts.

In other words, there are three grounds: First, contempt committed in the presence of the court; second, contempt committed so near as to interfere with the administration of justice; and, third, disobedience of the orders of the court.

Now, I submit that the offense of Mr. Marshall does not come within any of the three classes. If my memory is not at fault—and I had hoped to find the debates, but I can not—the history of this act is interesting. There was a judge in the West who decided a case, and the case was appealed. Pending the appeal the court published in a newspaper the reasons for the decision which he had rendered, whereupon a person published in another newspaper a statement as to why he thought the court was in error, and as a result of that the court had this man brought before it and punished him for contempt. Congress shortly thereafter enacted the statute which I have read.

Mr. MOON. Now, it is conceded by the act of 1831 that the jurisdiction of the inferior court, which they had inherent before that time, was limited to punishment for contempt committed in the presence of the court or for disobedience to an order of judgment and decrees on the outside. Does the gentleman think that the Congress would even have the power to deprive the House of Representatives of punishment for contempt.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not at all. I hold in my hand a decision in Nineteenth Wallace, a case in which the court, passing upon this section, says:

> The act in terms applies to all courts; whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt. But that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question.

I am not contending for a moment that there is not the power in Congress to punish for contempt in this case. I am not saying that we have the right to take that power away; but I am presenting to you, gentlemen, this proposition: If we have seen fit in the interest of free speech, if we have seen fit in order to prevent what we thought might be a dangerous abuse of the power of contempt to limit the inferior Federal courts only to punish for contempt of the three kinds I have enumerated, do you not think that a rule that we make for the court ought to be good enough to bind us in the exercise of our discretion as to when to punish for contempt and when not to do so?

Mr. MOON. Now, the gentleman in his argument puts the Congress and the Supreme Court of the United States on a level with the inferior courts.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, well, the gentleman may think there is something in that. I submit that if we think it is in the interest of the public not to permit a court, whether you call it an inferior court or not, to punish, except for certain kinds of contempt, are we so mighty, is our honor so peculiar, and must we be so sensitive of it as to claim for ourselves a rule of punishment that we are not going to permit to a district court or a circuit court of appeals? Gentlemen, I repeat, the Congress of the United States will best maintain its dignity and its standing among the people of America not by an overzeal as to punishing men who criticize it, but by zeal in its conduct, in its actions, that they may appeal to the judgment and the approval of the people of America. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman's position is that, regardless of what Mr. Marshall might have said either about the committee or about the Congress, the House of Representatives ought not to take cognizance of it in the interest of free speech?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman has just said——

Mr. SHERLEY. There are methods of taking cognizance of it. I would be glad to vote for a resolution expressing the opinion of the House of Representatives that the letter which Mr. Marshall wrote was unjustifiable and without excuse. I would be glad to take a position as to the investigation of any matter which involved the dignity of the House, but I am not willing to use the contempt process. I do not believe we ought to have a rule that we have laid down for the courts that we ourselves are not willing to abide by. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. My time is gone.

Mr. STERLING. I yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman think the House ought to pass a resolution such as he has just indicated, censuring Mr. Marshall for writing the letter, without giving him an opportunity to be heard in the House at all?

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. How else can we give him an opportunity to be heard, except by bringing him here?

Mr. SHERLEY. We have given Mr. Marshall an opportunity to be heard before the subcommittee. He has had his opportunity, so he can not say that judgment is being passed without an opportunity to be heard. But I submit again that there is a distinction between our expressing our view touching a matter of this kind, and the use of the process of contempt; and I submit that if we are going to take the extreme measure of contempt, then if you gentlemen or any of you believe there has been anything reprehensible in the action of any agency of the House, you ought to say that, too, as well as condemn the other.

Mr. STERLING. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to no one in high estimation of the honor and the dignity of this House; but I believe we can best preserve its honor and its dignity by not being oversensitive of criticism, of what we do. I have listened to criticism from the pulpit and from the platform; I have read in the newspapers and in the magazines criticisms of the House of Representatives, its committees and its Members, that are quite as severe as the criticism made of the subcommittee of the House by Mr. Marshall, whom I have never seen and do not know.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the framers of the Constitution of the United States ever intended that the House of Representatives should at any time resolve itself into a judicial body to pass upon a question after the fact, find a fact, and define the punishment for it, as the House is about to do by the adoption of this resolution.

The House of Representatives is not a part of the judiciary system of the United States. In the old days Parliament was the highest part of the judicial system of the British Empire. When the House of Lords and the House of Commons were separated, the House of Commons reserved a residuum of its original power as a judicial body, and did exercise a judicial function as to contempts of every kind; but within the last 60 years even the House of Commons has not undertaken to punish criticism made in the press, made in the pulpit, made by individuals, and made otherwise of its proceedings, as it formerly undertook to do. In the old days the House of Commons sent men to the gallows, sent men to the Tower for criticism of the House of Commons and of its proceedings; but a public sentiment arose in the British Empire because of the exercise of this sensitiveness by the House of Commons that made the House of Commons contemptible, and it became necessary for the House to desist from its action in those matters; and we in the United States House of Representatives will do well not to be oversentitive with regard to criticism that is made of our proceedings, especially criticisms that go to the right of free speech and of free press. I have the highest regard for the subcommittees of this House and would protect their proceedings.

The subcommittee in question could have had a contumaceous witness sent to prison for contempt for refusing to answer the inquiries put to him by reporting him to proper authority; but a criticism by an individual out of the presence of the committee, or by a letter sent to the committee, raises an entirely different question. The House of Representatives is to-day making an exhibition of sensitiveness that is not adding to its honor or to its dignity.

Mr. TAGGART. Will my colleague yield for a question there?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Just for a question.

Mr. TAGGART. Does not the gentleman think that the man who estimated the House of Representatives as a menagerie——

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, I have heard, and the gentleman has heard, in our own State criticisms that would make the statements of Mr. Marshall look like a defense of the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] I have heard such criticisms of every department of the Government.

Mr. MOON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

[Mr. GARNER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I had not intended to say anything on this resolution, but the debate has taken such a turn that I desire to submit two or three thoughts to you for your consideration.

The first is that this committee did not go to New York voluntarily or on its own volition, but went in obedience to a resolution that this House passed directing this investigation to be made. Much has been said which, I am sure, has created an impression on your minds that this subcommittee, in having public hearings in the preliminary investigation with a view to impeaching Mr. Marshall, has done an unusual thing. Such is not the case. The committee that conducted the preliminary examination of Federal Judge Dayton in West Virginia had public hearings. The preliminary examination of charges against Judge Archbald and Judge Swayne, of Florida, were public. The committee appointed by the last Congress which conducted a preliminary investigation with a view to impeachment of Judge Emory Spear, a Federal judge in my own State, had public hearings. So no unusual course has been pursued in regard to Mr. Marshall.

Now, if this subcommittee went as your agent, under authority from you, to conduct this investigation, and acted within the power delegated to them, which they certainly did, any contempt committed against the subcommittee necessarily was committed against this House. Take, for instance, the grand jury. A contumacious witness who refuses to testify before the grand jury, which is an arm of the court, is in contempt of the court, and the court will punish, notwithstanding the contempt was not committed against the court direct.

Take anyone making an assault upon a receiver of a court for some act done in obedience to the order of the court, the court will handle that. Undoubtedly, if this subcommittee was acting as your agent, and was acting within the scope for which they were appointed, a contempt against them was a contempt against you. I had the honor to serve on this special committee, and I can speak for my colleagues upon it. We have no pride of opinion as to this report which we have made. As several of them have told you, we earnestly desired Mr. Marshall to act in a way whereby we could make and report to you asking that no further action be taken, and if any Member of this House will read carefully the report of your subcommittee he can not escape that conclusion. What is the report before you, and what are you called upon to vote upon? Your subcommittee reports that in their judgment the matter in question is of itself contumacious and violates the privileges of this House. Your subcommittee asks, or, rather, the committee report is, that you vote to adopt the resolution read at the Clerk's desk; and what is the effect of it? That resolution does not prescribe any definite punishment to be inflicted upon Mr. Marshall. Not one word is said as to what action the House shall take as to punishment, but the resolution provides that the defendant, Mr. Marshall, shall be arrested and brought before the bar of this House charged with contempt, and that he be given an opportunity to purge himself of that contempt. The resolution provides that when brought here he can be heard either in person or by counsel and be permitted to offer any reason or excuse that he sees fit—do anything to purge himself of the contempt; and if he purges himself, I am sure this House would not inflict any punishment upon him. The adoption of the resolution simply brings the defendant before you, giving him an opportunity to be heard, and after hearing him you to decide what action shall be taken in the premises. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the Members of this House, when they come to vote upon the issue that is before us, will divest their minds of the fact that a Member of this House has preferred charges of impeachment against Mr. Marshall, and of the fact that that Member of the House has been indicted in the district where Mr. Marshall presides as district attorney. Those two things have nothing whatever to do with the question on which we are to act. All of us may have sympathies on those matters but they should not influence our action now. If any Member votes on the resolution presented, basing his vote upon his sympathies one way or the other with reference to the position in which Mr. BUCHANAN is situated, or with reference to the fact that Mr. Marshall has had impeachment charges preferred against him, he will probably make a mistake upon the question that we are now to decide. I regret very much that some of the gentlemen who are opposed to this resolution have seen fit to discuss the impeachment charges that have been preferred against Mr. Marshall, and the indictment that has been returned in the southern district of New York against Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] should have raised his voice at the time Mr. BUCHANAN preferred those charges if he wanted to present to this House the argument he presents to-day. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] should have been heard then, or should have waited until the time when those charges have been returned to the House by the Committee on the Judiciary for action. Let us not invoke our prejudices or our sympathies in those matters now.

The question before us now is a simple one. Should Mr. Marshall be brought before the House to answer the charge of contempt which the special committee finds he has committed?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman not think that the mode of procedure adopted was a proper subject to discuss in connection with the letter which Mr. Marshall wrote, with a view of determining whether he meant to be contemptuous or not?

Mr. STERLING. I think the conduct of the committee is the proper subject to be discussed at this time. We should seek to ascertain whether or not its conduct justified the letter written and published by Mr. Marshall, and nothing else.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is all I discussed.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman discussed the impeachment charges at length. I say we are not concerned at this time with the impeachment nor with the indictment. If we permit them to enter into our deliberations to-day we are liable to commit a serious wrong. They should be left absolutely out of this discussion.

Mr. Marshall wrote this letter. Is there a Member of this House who will deny that it is a libel on the House of Representatives? Where is the Member who will say that when Mr. Marshall wrote in that letter addressed to Mr. CARLIN and published in the newspapers, to the effect that the House of Representatives was proceeding to thwart justice in the courts of New York by forestalling the indictment of Mr. BUCHANAN, he was not guilty of a libel of the House of Representatives?

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. I will say that it is not a libel, because the letter itself specifically says that in order to save a newspaper man the committee had arrested he was telling the committee what he had said to that newspaper man in a conversation. That is no libel.

Mr. STERLING. In that case the original offense was committed when he talked to the reporter and repeated when he wrote and published the letter. It is plain that Mr. Marshall was very little concerned about the welfare of the newspaper man. He takes that occasion to charge the committee and the House with seeking to defeat the prosecution of a Member charged with crime. It had no relation whatever to the newspaper reporter. He was angry and malicious because the House had dared to order an investigation of his official conduct. If you believe that the House of Representatives sought to protect Mr. BUCHANAN from prosecution, if you believe that any Member, when we referred those charges to the Judiciary Committee, voted with a view of defending Mr. BUCHANAN, then you ought to vote against this resolution.

Nobody will undertake to say to-day that a single Member had it in his mind to assist Mr. BUCHANAN in his defense of the prosecution that was instituted in New York. I can hardly think of a meaner thing that could be said of us. Mr. Marshall wrote that letter and that is what he charged. He did not only charge the subcommittee with that offense but he charged the House of Representatives with it. As has been stated, when Mr. Marshall came before the special committee to be heard he submitted a written statement. This statement was his own interpretation of his letter and his defense of his act. It was not spoken in the heat of the moment. He brought this paper before the committee in typewriting and read it. It is an extreme aggravation of the charges which he made in the letter, and we ought to consider it in connection with the letter. He offers it to the committee and to the House as a plea of justification for the letter. I think it is a well-settled principle of the law of libel that a plea of justification, if not proven, may be considered as an aggravation of the damages. Let us see what he says in his statement before the special committee. He begins the statement with a somewhat extended history of everything that had occurred from the time Mr. BUCHANAN rose on the floor of this House and presented charges against Mr. Marshall. He tells what Mr. BUCHANAN did, he tells what the House of Representatives did, and, after relating the history of the proceedings up to the time he made the statement, he said this:

As these events progressed I paid little attention to them. I have been able to state the facts accurately, because I have obtained for the purposes of this statement the copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which these events are narrated. The whole thing—

Referring to the history of the case that he had just recited—

The whole thing when it first occurred seemed to me to be a desperate effort to postpone the trial of Mr. BUCHANAN by putting pressure on the district attorney.

Everything that we have done, the fact that we had preferred the charges to the Committee on the Judiciary, all of it satisfied Mr. Marshall that the House of Representatives was trying to defeat the prosecution of one of its Members.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman permit an interrogation?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did not Mr. Marshall write a second letter, in which he distinctly stated that he made no charge against the Committee on the Judiciary or the House of Representatives?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; he said that.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did he not also say in this very statement the same thing?

Mr. STERLING. Substantially so.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did not he, therefore, confine what he had said to his belief as to the views and acts that came under his observation as performed by the committee?

Mr. STERLING. No, sir. He said just what I have read, and he said it in reference to what the House had done as well as what the committee had done.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield once more.

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a very short question. Did not Mr. Marshall insist over and over again that he did not intend any contempt of the House or the Committee on the Judiciary, and had made no criticism of either the House or the Committee on the Judiciary, but that his criticism was confined solely to the conduct of the subcommittee?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; he said that in the second letter, and made this statement after that, in which he charged the House with the contemptible crime of trying to prevent the prosecution of a Member charged with conspiracy. But suppose he had confined the libel to the committee? The action of the subcommittee was the action of the House. They were performing the duties of the House If we can not protect the committees of this House, then we can not protect the House.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. STERLING. No; I will not yield any more now.

Mr. GRAHAM. Just for one more question.

Mr. STERLING. I yield for one question.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does the gentleman think that a subcommittee making an investigation is above criticism either by the public press or the man against whom the investigation is aimed?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not. If a committee or the House deserves criticism or censure they ought to get it, and I hope they will.

Mr. GRAHAM. Is the freedom of the public body to be destroyed?

Mr. STERLING. No; I do not think anything of the kind. If I thought this subcommittee was guilty of the conduct which Marshall charges, I would not be on the floor defending it at this time. I submit to you that the conduct of the subcommittee was proper. I have read this record with great care, and I am not able to find one single instance with reference to the investigation of Mr. Marshall where the subcommittee did not act properly and decently.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman think that it was proper for the subcommittee to invade the sanctity of the grand jury to hold open meetings and do that thing?

Mr. STERLING. I will answer that question. There has been a great deal said here about the sanctity of the grand jury. The purpose of the secrecy of the grand jury is to protect innocent persons, and I undertake to say there is not any proceeding of any grand jury that may not be disclosed in proper cases. If the proceedings of a grand jury may not be inquired into, it may become a monstrous instrument of oppression. Perjury and other crimes might be committed with impunity under the mask of grand-jury secrecy. Its conduct may be inquired into at all times when justice requires it. The committee did not need to know what evidence was offered to indict Mr. BUCHANAN and others, but they did have the right to know whether there was any evidence at all on which the indictment rested. This subcommittee found out from the grand jurymen what it was proper they should find out. One charge of Mr. BUCHANAN was that Mr. Marshall had procured indictments without any evidence, and they had a perfect right to ask the grand jurymen whether or not there was any evidence at all on which to indict Mr. BUCHANAN. They did ask the question, and it was answered.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. STERLING. No; I will not submit to any more questions. I have not the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STERLING. They might have found what the evidence was before the grand jury if they had needed it, by going before the court and showing that the information was necessary in the interest of justice.

They did find out that there was testimony on which an indictment was made, and that was all they needed to pass on that particular charge. The conduct of a grand jury is based purely on their conscience, and if they think the evidence is sufficient to return an indictment, nobody—the court nor Congress—has any right to inquire into it. The committee did ascertain the fact there was evidence on which Mr. BUCHANAN was indicted. They had a perfect right to know that with reference to the charge that Mr. BUCHANAN had made against Mr. Marshall.

Now, something has been said about the committee having open sessions. It is impractical to have closed sessions in hearings of this kind. You can not keep secret the conduct of such committees. Committees are appointed by this House to perform certain duties, and they have to make it public when they present it to the House; it will all have to be printed, and it then becomes a matter of public knowledge. It can not be kept a secret and ought not to be.

In every case with which I am familiar—in the Archibald case, in the Hanford case, and all of the cases so far reported—the committee has held open sessions, and it is the proper way of conducting those hearings. The public has a right to know what its servants are doing.

Mr. Marshall complains in his letter that the committee called all kinds of rogues as witnesses in this investigation. Will anyone say that the committee did wrong in calling rogues? The committee can not select the character of the witnesses whom they call. They must call the witnesses who they think have knowledge of the facts they are investigating. Some of these witnesses had been indicted, and perhaps one or two had been convicted under Mr. Marshall's administration; but they were the very witnesses that he used before the grand jury and before the court to convict other citizens of the United States. It was the situation and not the committee that determined who should be witnesses.

But now, let us see. All of them were not rogues. Some of the very best people in the city of New York, I dare say, were called before that committee. Judge Meyer, one of the judges of the southern district of New York, was before the committee. Mr. Stanchfield, a lawyer of New York City, who has a reputation as wide as the United States, was before that committee. Mr. Wise, the ex-district attorney of the southern district of New York, was before that committee, and they had a great many very reputable witnesses before it. I am not saying that all of them were reputable, but I do say that simply because a man has been indicted we ought not to consider him unworthy of belief. This committee, I dare say, was just as competent as a judge or a jury to pass upon the credibility of witnesses. They had a right to take the character of the witnesses into consideration. It was their duty to call everybody whom they thought had information or knew anything about the charges that were before them, and to give to their testimony such weight as they thought it was entitled to. As an illustration, they called a lawyer by the name of Kugel. He had been indicted twice. There had been a mistrial in both cases. Now, Kugel had been called by Mr. Marshall before the grand jury to indict other people. They called a man by the name of Feldman, from New Haven, Conn., who had been indicted in the district court and acquitted, and Mr. Marshall had used him before the grand jury to indict other people. They called a lawyer by the name of Oppenheimer, who had been indicted for subornation of perjury, but never convicted. Mr. Marshall had used him to find indictments and to convict people in the courts down there. And they called other persons who had been indicted and other persons whom Mr. Marshall had used in the courts there to convict and to indict citizens.

Now, let us see if this committee was partisan, if it went there with a view of finding Mr. Marshall guilty of the charges regardless of the fact. Let me just read a bit of evidence which the committee elicited from some of the principal witnesses that were before them.

Judge Mayer was there for the purpose of giving evidence on the charge that Marshall had used his influence in trying to get certain judges to come to the southern district of New York to try his criminal cases. That was the purpose of the witness. But this subcommittee went far out of the way in questioning Judge Mayer to prove good character for Mr. Marshall. This is one question they asked him:

What is the general reputation, if you know, of Mr. Marshall among the practitioners at the bar and the courts there as to his character and professional standing?

Judge MAYER. I think Mr. Marshall is regarded as a man of absolute uprightness, of the highest ideals, a lawyer of real ability; and, speaking now for myself, I am frank to say that, much as I have respected some of his predecessors, I think better of him than I do of some of them, for one reason, in addition to character, ability, and the like, which they all possess, and that is that he does not exploit himself in the newspapers, and that he does not, so far as I can see, appeal for personal advantage through spectacular methods. I have no hesitation in saying before this body or any other that I regard him as a high-minded, upright man, utterly uncontrollable by anything on earth except what he thinks is right. I have known him many years, both as a lawyer in our relations as lawyers and since he has been an official and I have been an official. If here and there some inapt or unwise thing has been done by some young assistant, you will find that has been done through zeal or mistaken notion that these young assistants have when they first get the responsibility of being assistant prosecuting officers. I really respect him very much, and I count him as one of the men that I know who would not consciously do anything that went contrary to his opinion of what is just and right. He doubtless makes mistakes, like the rest of us.

As I say, I do not hesitate to say to you gentlemen, as I have often said in the presence of others, that one thing that appeals to me about him more than anything else—because I assume the other qualities in a public officer—is the fact that, as the expression goes, he does not "play to the galleries." Of course certain kinds of cases become the subject of newspaper exploitation by the very nature of the case, and you can not help that; but Mr. Marshall is not the kind of man who is looking for his own vainglory. I can not imagine any reason why he took his present position, excepting for the honor involved, because he enjoyed a very lucrative practice and was regarded before he came here as a lawyer of real ability, especially as a trial lawyer.

Now, this is the certificate which Judge Mayer, one of the presiding judges, gives as to the character of Mr. Marshall. They called it out. Do you suppose if this committee were biased, if they were there to give Mr. Marshall anything but a square deal, they would elicit information of that kind?

Judge Mayer goes to great length in speaking of the character of Mr. Marshall. He is not the only one. There were other witnesses on this point, and they are witnesses that ought to know. The subcommittee asked of every man that would have knowledge of the character and standing of Mr. Marshall for their estimate of him. They asked Mr. Stanchfield this question:

Mr. CARLIN. What is Mr. Marshall's professional standing at the New York bar?

Mr. STANCHFIELD. He was, before he became district attorney, a law partner of Senator O'GORMAN, a member of the firm of O'Gorman, Battle & Marshall, and before that he had been a member of the firm of Weeks, Battle & Marshall, Bartow S. Weeks being the senior member of that firm, and Mr. Weeks is now a justice of the supreme court of the State, and Mr. Marshall's reputation for 15 years at the New York bar has been of the very highest character.

Mr. CARLIN. He enjoys the same reputation now?

Mr. STANCHFIELD. Absolutely so, so far as I have ever heard.

Then they asked Mr. Wise, who at one time was district attorney of the southern district in New York, and this is what Mr. Wise said about it:

Mr. CARLIN. Would you consider a thing of that kind proper?

Mr. WISE. I would not. I do not believe Mr. Marshall would, either. I know of no man for whom I have a higher regard, or of any man who has a keener sense of justice, and I am sure that if that matter had been put to him in the proper way that, if anything improper was being done, he would not have tolerated it for a minute.

And these gentlemen that Mr. Marshall has abused, these men that were on the subcommittee and whom Mr. Marshall has libeled in the fiercest kind of way, are the men who culled out this testimony with reference to the character of Mr. Marshall.

That is some of the testimony that these gentlemen whom he has abused elicited from these witnesses. Does it indicate that this subcommittee was down there for the purpose of mistreating Mr. Marshall?

Mr. SIEGEL. Was not that testimony taken in New York?

Mr. STERLING. That was taken in New York.

May I ask the gentleman from New York for the newspaper clipping that he had read? The House will remember that the gentleman from New York had the Clerk read a newspaper clipping in the form of a resolution from the bar association, and you will remember that the bar association does not undertake to defend Mr. Marshall in this contempt proceeding. They do say something about the conduct of the committee. And these are some of the questions which they point out as improper questions to have been asked of witnesses. I assume that this bar association, friends of Mr. Marshall, seeking to help him wherever they can, sought out in all that long record of questions, if there are any improper questions, the questions that are most improper; and let us see what they are. The committee asked the assistant United States attorney, Mr. Sarfaty, who presented the case to the grand jury, the question as to whether he made an argument before the grand jury. That was in reference to the charge made by Mr. BUCHANAN that Marshall had procured indictments without any evidence before the grand jury.

Was there anything improper about that? It was eminently proper and necessary. I submit to you, how would this subcommittee get at the facts of that charge if they had not asked that question?

Here is another one that the bar association points out:

Whether an investigation was made of Representative BUCHANAN and Messrs. Lamar, Shulteis, Martin, and others by the detective department of district attorney's office?

Was there anything wrong about that? That is the second question that the bar association, made up of the fellow members and the friends of Mr. Marshall, point out. How, I submit to you, would the committee get at the facts charged in Mr. BUCHANAN'S statement, without asking questions of that kind? It is not asking them to reveal any of the secrets of the grand jury.

The next question is—

Who were the detectives assigned for this work?

Why should not Mr. BUCHANAN, the man indicted, or any defendant who has been indicted, know who the witnesses are against him? In the State of Illinois the law requires that the name of every witness who goes before the grand jury must be indorsed on the back of the indictment. And then, if the prosecuting attorney desires to call any other witnesses in addition to those who were before the grand jury, he must give the defense written notice of the witnesses whom he is going to call. I believe that is the law in all of the States of this Union. Because it does not happen to be the practice in the southern district of New York does not make it vicious, does not render it bad.

Mr. BENNET. I will say to the gentleman that it is the statute of the State of New York, that the names of the witnesses shall be placed on the back of the indictment. Under the Federal practice only the name of the foreman is put on the back.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose the law of every State in the Union requires the indorsement of the names of the witnesses on the back of the indictment. I know of none that does not. Now, here is another question:

Whether any evidence was presented to the grand jury against BUCHANAN?

That was BUCHANAN'S charge—that he and other persons had been indicted without evidence—and I submit that it was perfectly proper for the witnesses to answer that question and it was perfectly proper for the grand jurors or anybody else who knew the facts to answer, and many of them did answer. I think six of the grand jurors, including the foreman, were before the subcommittee.

The sixth question was—

Who made the complaint and who furnished the information against them to the office of the district attorney?

Is there anything wrong about that? Why should not the defendant know who the complaining witness is? Every single question that the Bar Association of New York mentions in that report was a proper question. They were necessary questions to get at the facts of the matter which this subcommittee were investigating.

So I submit to you, gentlemen, that if that is all the astute lawyers of the city of New York can find to criticize in the action of this committee they have not very much fault to find with this subcommittee.

Mr. Speaker, when Mr. Marshall was before the special committee he complained of the conduct of the subcommittee in New York. I gave him a copy of the evidence that had been taken in that city and asked him to mark everything in that record to which he objected. He did that, and I have here an exact copy of all the evidence which he marked. The original copy which he marked is in the office of the chairman. I submit that I have not found one single thing he marked that was objectionable. I have gone through the record with great care and I find he has marked as objectionable evidence and questions much of which was absolutely proper and absolutely necessary for the witnesses to answer. Let me just read at random some of the things that he has marked. Before I do that I will say that when he was before this special committee he called attention to one thing of which he complained very bitterly.

One of the members of the subcommittee asked a witness by the name of Anderson whether or not Mr. Hershenstein had charged him any fee for representing him in a criminal proceeding. Well, now, that might be construed either way. That member of the committee might have done that for the purpose of drawing out the fact that Mr. Marshall's office did not charge fees for prosecuting criminal cases. On the other hand, he might have done it in the hope of eliciting the fact that Mr. Marshall or some of his assistants had charged fees; and if he had, it was certainly proper for the subcommittee to find out that fact. But I will tell you why the member of the committee asked that question. Mr. Wood, one of the assistants in Mr. Marshall's office, had testified that he had represented some parties in civil matters who were afterwards indicted. Now, it would have been perfectly proper for Mr. Wood, the assistant attorney, to have charged for his services in representing that gentleman in civil matters. Then when this came up as to Mr. Hershenstein, another assistant of the district attorney's office, it was very natural for the committee to inquire whether or not he had received pay for the services he had rendered a man in another case. I dare say that that is the offense of which Mr. Marshall complains most. It is the only one he refers to in his written statement before the subcommittee, and I assume from that it is the one on which he most depends to show misconduct of the subcommittee. Can it be said that this indicates any ill will toward him on the part of the committee? It shows the contrary. It elicited testimony favorable to his office.

But here is an illustration, reading at random from the parts of the record marked by Mr. Marshall:

Mr. CARLIN. Did you have any connection with the warrant issued against David Keen?

Mr. Wood, who was an assistant of Mr. Marshall, replied:

That complaint came in, sir, without my knowledge. It was a verbal complaint. I did not know it was in the office until it had been in the office several days. I was then told by Mr. Hershenstein that there was such a case in the office. I immediately told Mr. Hershenstein that he must be very careful with that case and not proceed unless he was sure he had a perfectly good case.

Do you see any objection to that? And yet that is one of the parts of this record that Mr. Marshall marks as very objectionable to him.

Here is another. Mr. CARLIN said:

Do you remember saying to him, "Well, if you don't give up this property, I will get you"?

Mr. Wood said:

No, I never said any such thing.

Mr. CARLIN. Were you retained as counsel in that case?

Mr. WOOD. No, sir; I have never gotten any retainer. I did it for Mr. Alfred Ritter, an attorney in Colorado Springs, who was my roommate at the University of Virginia.

Here is another. Mr. CARLIN says:

The thing I am after is, did it appear either on demurrer or motion to quash, or any other way, that the indictment had been changed after it left the grand jury room?

And Mr. Wood said:

As to those two indictments, there was no such allegation.

Here is another place that he has marked. Mr. GARD says:

Do you know anything about Mr. Wood's connection with that case?

Mr. Anderson says:

No, sir. He had no connection with me in this case. I did not know Mr. Wood.

These are samples of the record marked by Mr. Marshall, showing the basis of his complaint. These are the things that he assigns as the basis of his belief that the committee were not conducting the investigation in good faith and that the whole thing was an effort to shield Mr. BUCHANAN from prosecution.

The parts I read are fair samples of his complaints. I do not think they justify this bitter, malicious, and unreasonable attack on the integrity of the House. On the contrary, they show, to my mind, that this subcommittee pursued a very proper course and had a true and ethical conception of their duties and responsibilities. For the House to refuse to call to account the man who so unjustly libeled it would be a heartless desertion of our faithful Representatives. There is nowhere in this record anything that indicates an improper action on the part of this subcommittee more than I have read to you. It seems to me we are considering a matter of vast importance to the House and to the country. If these ugly words had been uttered by a private citizen we might afford to ignore them. But this attack is made by a man high in office in another branch of the Government. If we sit silent such treatment will bring the legislative branch into contempt. With a firm belief in the integrity of the House and its committee, I am convinced this man should be called to account for his insults. If he had not ignored the action of the House and the committee, but had assisted the committee in getting at the truth of the charges, he would have found out that the committee was entirely fair to him. He drew his conclusions from the headlines in the newspapers and his conclusions were grossly wrong. Mr. Marshall is a man of large experience, holding a high office under the Government, and under the record in this case is of excellent character as a lawyer and a man, but these things are no defense to libel. They are all to be considered as an aggravation of the injury and damage he has done. If this House has faith in its own honor and integrity, it will require this man to answer to this charge.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Speaker, I have known Mr. Marshall for 15 years. We are personal friends. We have appeared as opponents in cases against him in the civil courts of our city, and I have defended a person accused of crime in the United States courts in a case in which he was conducting the prosecution personally. I have a very high personal regard for him. He is all that any gentleman has said of him here when mentioning him in terms of respect and approbation. A man of stainless personal character, of probity in the highest degree; an official that has a proper regard for the duties of his office. It is very distasteful to me as a Member of this body, sitting in a quasi-judicial capacity, to be obliged to cast the vote that I shall be obliged to cast in a few moments. But it seems to me that the special committee has done the only thing that it could have done.

The question is very simple. There is no question involved of the indictment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]; that is to be tried in the court by a prosecutor other than Mr. Marshall. There is no question involved of the impeachment brought by the gentleman from Illinois against Mr. Marshall; that is to be determined in the first instance by the Judiciary Committee and afterwards by the House.

But here is a plain issue. Mr. Marshall in his letter of March 4 said:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

In other words, it is not a single issue, it is a double issue. Either Mr. Marshall made statements which he can not substantiate or else there are three Members of this House whose present standing before the country is equal to that of Mr. Marshall, whose character is as high, whose reputation is as good; three Members of this House who ought not even to be permitted to have an opportunity to resign, but who, if Mr. Marshall's charges are correct, ought to be expelled from this body, because the charge is direct and specific that they left this Capitol under appointment to conduct an impartial investigation, but with the purpose, from the outset, of not doing anything of the sort, but to go to the district of New York where

Mr. Marshall was the district attorney, for the purpose of intimidating him in a proceeding which had been commenced during his term of office.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNET. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman from New York really think that is the issue here respecting the question of contempt; that is, Mr. Marshall on one side and the subcommittee on the other?

Mr. BENNET. It seems to me very clear that that is the issue—that Mr. Marshall, in order to purge himself from contempt, can do one of several things. First, he can disavow this language, or, if his desire is to purge himself from contempt and he has evidence to do it, a very certain and satisfactory way for him to purge himself would be to prove the charges that he makes against the three Members of this House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman from Texas made that same argument. I think it is an unfounded argument to submit to the House. That is not the issue here.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman from Virginia has a right to his own opinion, but it differs from Mr. Marshall's, because Mr. Marshall said, on page 75——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I say that in my judgment; I have great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Marshall characterizes his own statement on page 75 when he said:

> At whatever discomfort to myself, it is my intention to see this case to the end.

That is Mr. Marshall's attitude. Now, I want to say that, knowing him as I do as a man whose ideas of personal honor are high, I assume that he credits the great majority of us with the same kind of regard for our own personal honor as he himself possesses, and that he would regard us as cowards if we voted down the report and deprived him of his opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the time was agreed upon the other day of two hours upon each side I had expected to ask that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] have some time, but it slipped my mind, although the question was raised that day, and I told my colleagues that there was no one else who desired time in opposition to the resolution. I now ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] may have 10 minutes, not to be taken out of the allotted time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] have 10 minutes, not to be taken out or charged up to the 4-hour agreement.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] have 10 minutes, not to be charged up to the original allotment.

Mr. MOON. In that same connection, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the committee, have 10 minutes, not to be charged up to the allotted time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] have 10 minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina have 10 minutes, not to be charged up to the original time. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I will go them one better and ask unanimous consent that I may have 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. We will attend to the others first. Is there objection to the requests of the gentlemen from Tennessee, North Carolina, and Illinois?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] that he have 15 minutes?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I shall object. I made the request that I did particularly for the purpose of evening up the time. The most of the time that has been occupied has been occupied by those in favor of the resolution; but I suppose the gentleman from Kentucky wants time in favor of the resolution. I have no objection to that extension of time, but there may be other gentlemen who want additional time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] or the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] when these three gentlemen are to speak?

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will proceed now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has 37 minutes remaining. When does he desire to use that?

Mr. MOON. I will use 10 minutes of that now. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as one of the most important questions that has challenged the attention of this House since I have been a Member of it, nearly 12 years. Not only the honor, the dignity, the privileges of this subcommittee are involved, but almost the very existence of the House itself is involved in the determination of this resolution. I take it that there is no question of the power of the House to deal with the matter. That being true, then, it occurs to me there is but one question for the House to determine, and that is as to whether or not this letter constitutes a contempt of the House of Representatives. My friend from Pennsylvania Mr. GRAHAM seemed to think in a colloquy that he had with some gentleman that the House or a committee of the House does not stand upon the same plane with a judge of a court. I want to call that gentleman's attention to some language uttered by the Hon. Jeremiah S. Black, of Pennsylvania, in 1873, before the constitutional convention of the State of Pennsylvania, right along that line, and under permission I will insert that address of Mr. Black upon that subject at this point. The convention having resolved itself in the committee of the whole on the report of the committee on legislation, Mr. Black rose and spoke as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, this is a subject upon which I speak with great reluctance. But I am deeply anxious about it. I do most devoutly believe that the destiny of the Commonwealth, and perhaps that of the whole country, depends upon the decision to which this convention may come. I beg a brief hearing.
> It will be admitted that the legislative function is by far the most important one in any free government. It is the supreme power of the State. All others are insignificant in comparison to it, inasmuch as all the others are bound to obey its will. The executive is absolutely controlled by it in all the details of his administration. It marks out the path in which he shall walk. And it is able to punish him severely for any departure from it. The legislature can not appoint the judges, but it can do more, it can command them what they shall do after they are appointed. All the legal justice we get is manufactured at the seat of government and sent down in bulk to the courts where it is distributed among the people according to the wants and merits of each individual. The legislature regulates the practices of the courts, makes and unmakes the rules of evidence, and furnishes the standard of decision for every cause. It defines all public offenses and supplies the remedy for every private wrong. All rights and all obligations are protected and enforced in the way that it prescribes, and can not be either protected or enforced at all without its aid and assistance.
> The members of the legislature are the custodians and trustees of all public property. They can sell it or give it away, or they can increase it by making additional purchases. The taxing power enables them to descend as deep as they please into the pockets of the people of every class, and it has absolute control and appropriates all the revenue after it is collected.
> What is a still higher consideration, they are the guardians of public morality. It depends upon them whether virtue shall be promoted or vice and crime encouraged. The theory is that the legislature, being the supreme power of the State, commands what is right and prohibits what is wrong, and in a certain sense the mere command or prohibition does of itself make it right or wrong. What we are taught in the Bible is certainly true, that they who frame iniquity into a law compel the people to become workers of iniquity.
> What we want above all things upon the earth is honest legislation; and when I say we want it I use the word in the double sense of needing it and lacking it.

Thus spoke Jeremiah S. Black, one of the ablest lawyers who ever lived in the State of Pennsylvania or any other State.

Mr. Speaker, this House for years has been giving away its authority, its power, its rights, and its privileges until to-day we are practically the laughingstock of the country. The yellow journals of the country say what they please, officials of one kind and another say what they please about us, and now it remains for this district attorney of New York, inflated with egotism, as his letter and his whole conduct shows, to express his opinion about us; and I want to call attention briefly to some of his expressions in order to show his absolute contempt not only for this committee but for the entire committee and for the House of Representatives itself; and I want to say right here in passing that there are not upon the floor of this House, and have not been since I have been here, three men more honorable, more appreciative of their position here and their duties and responsibilities, and more conservative, than are CARLIN, GARD, and NELSON. [Applause.]

This House could not have sent to New York a more conservative subcommittee, nor one that would have conducted itself with more honor and credit to themselves and to the House. I shall not have the time to go fully into it, but I want to call attention to a few of the statements of this gentleman, and this is his statement after he had had ample time to cool down, after he had considered it in all its bearings. He says:

> In my letter to the chairman of the subcommittee, dated March 4, 1916, I have summarized my views of the conduct of the subcommittee during their visit in New York. There was no assistant of mine called before them who was not subjected to indignity and insult. For instance, Mr. Roger Wood, who was engaged in the trial of an important case, was called before the subcommittee after he had finished his speech to the jury and while the jury in his case was out and subjected to a violent and abusive cross-examination by the subcommittee. I was told by a reporter connected with the New York Tribune that if I desired testimony as to the general manner of the subcommittee I could call on him, as he had just heard the examination of Mr. Wood. He said that he had never heard a "pimp" in a white-slave case subjected to the kind of treatment that Mr. Wood had to submit to at the hands of the subcommittee.

And, again:

In the case which I am now discussing the situation was most remarkable. The subcommittee had very frankly placed itself under the entire domination of an indicted Congressman. They permitted him to name their counsel, and then the subcommittee and the worthy counsel vied with each other in the selection of language toward my assistants and myself which I will not undertake to characterize.

Is not that contempt—is not that contemptuous toward the committee, and the authorities are absolutely uniform that the committee representing and having the power of the House, any contempt offered the committee was a contempt of the House itself. There can be no question about that being sound law, and, by the way, we have heard a good deal of remarkable law to-day. My friend from New York, Mr. SIEGEL, if I heard him correctly, said that some of this committee, the subcommittee, or the Judiciary Committee, had come to the conclusion that the United States court had no jurisdiction in the Rae Tanzer case, and then stated, "If that is not contempt, I do not know what contempt is." Well, my friend does not know what contempt is. The idea that you can not question the jurisdiction of a court without being in contempt! Mr. Speaker, pleas to the jurisdiction are filed every day in courts all over this country, in the State and in the United States courts. Nobody has ever thought that that was a contempt until this gentleman from New York discovered it.

On page 75 of this record I find this remarkable statement:

I do not deny that my letter of March 4, 1916, was written while I was in a state of intense and violent indignation at the treatment to which I and my assistants had been subjected. I have thought it over in cooler moments since writing it, and I find in it nothing to regret and nothing to retract. There is not a word in it which is not true. Under the same circumstances I should write the same letter again, and it is my honest opinion that any investigation by Congress should be rather into the actions of the subcommittee which sought to bring public disgrace upon my assistants and myself than into my own resentment of their methods.

This whole case is a novel and extraordinary one. There have been Members of Congress who have had to face the criminal courts, but there was never one before who resorted to defense by impeachment. I am not the only district attorney whose duty may require him to present to a grand jury charges against a Member of the House of Representatives. Mr. BUCHANAN is not the first Member of the House of Representatives who has violated the Federal law, and there may be other Members of that House who will find themselves in Mr. BUCHANAN'S predicament.

That is not only an insult and a contempt, but it is a threat held over the heads of Members of Congress, that they, too, are likely to be indicted unless they go slow with this performance. Mr. Speaker, this man is not fit to be district attorney. He either is a monumental egotist or an arrant fool; I do not care what the gentlemen from New York say about him.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, when he came before this committee finally, and the chairman and the other gentlemen of the select committee gave him every opportunity to say something to palliate his offense, this is what was said:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Marshall, you have written these two letters, and, of course, you must realize that that letter is an intensely offensive document to that subcommittee. After you have had time to reflect upon the letter and upon the whole matter and all the whole facts and circumstances connected with it, do you still want this committee to understand that you meant everything you said in those letters, and that you have no apology to make in reference to them?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You do?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Understanding fully that this committee represented the House of Representatives?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

There, Mr. Speaker, is a cool, deliberate, and intentional contempt for the House of Representatives expressed in language which can not be misunderstood.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] is recognized for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything about the Buchanan case. I have never made any inquiry into the merits or the demerits of the case. I can say that no member of the Judiciary Committee has done so. Therefore, in my opinion, the Buchanan case has nothing whatever to do with this matter against the New York district attorney. I do not know Mr. Snowden Marshall. I believe—they tell me—he calls his name "Snodden" Marshall. I have never yet been unfortunate enough to become acquainted with him, and hope I never will. [Laughter.] He has been guilty of insulting not only the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee but of insulting this House, and he ought to be dealt with. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] spoke upon this question at some length an hour or two ago, and informed this House of some fearful and wonderful law. He said, as I have been informed—I did not hear him—that that committee had no power to summon members of the grand jury before it and had no power to require that the minutes of the grand jury be brought before it, and I am informed further that he stated that in no case could the proceedings of a grand jury be brought into a court of justice. I do not know whether he made those statements or not. That may be the law in Pennsylvania and in New York, but it is certainly not the law in any civilized community. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir; with pleasure. [Laughter.] But the gentleman must take this out of his own time, not out of mine.

Mr. GRAHAM. Was the gentleman present when I spoke?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir. I said I was not, but I wish I had been.

Mr. GRAHAM. As a good lawyer, the gentleman ought not to give hearsay evidence.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, to go beyond that——

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman is mistaken in what I said.

Mr. THOMAS. I say that a committee of this House acted in a judicial capacity, and the decisions of all the courts of this country recognize the fact that it has the right to this character of testimony. I say that as a lawyer. I say that to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is on the same committee that I am on, the Judiciary Committee, and he is a fine lawyer and a splendid gentleman and a Republican, but outside of that he is all right [laughter.], and he must have gone off in a moment of excitement in the defense of this man Snowden Marshall.

Now, as I stated, I never saw him, but sometimes, you know, we can draw upon our imagination, and when we do, frequently it is not true, but I imagine that the kind of a district attorney that the evidence and the records that have been before our commitee show him to be, that he is such a fellow that will turn up his pants at the bottom when it rains in London, and it seems to me that there are some gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania who want to turn up the bottoms of their pants every time that he does. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, I do not have as much respect for court decisions as a great many people do. There is not a court in this land, there never has been a court since the dawn of civilization, that has not crossed its tracks in its decisions as often as a fox would cross its tracks on a night when the hounds were after it. Why, it was a judicial decision, gentlemen, that sent Christ along the stony streets of Jerusalem bending beneath the burden of the cross. It was a judicial decision that compelled Socrates to drink the fatal draft of hemlock.

Now, let us see the gentlemen who are on the subcommittee—CHARLIE CARLIN, Mr. NELSON, and Judge GARD. These are the men that this letter charges with offenses which, if true, every one of them ought to be sent to the penitentiary instead of being in Congress. Why, he states that they deliberately went up there for the purpose of humiliating him, and deliberately summoned all of the rogues and rascals they could lay their hands on to testify in that case. I believe that is not true, because my opinion is that they did not summon everybody in the district attorney's office, so consequently, in my opinion, they could not have gotten all the rogues and rascals. [Laughter.] Now, let us see:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

Do you believe that—that Judge GARD, that CHARLIE CARLIN, that JOHN M. NELSON went to New York City with that deliberate purpose? Do you believe it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has in this House defended this fellow, whom, I believe, instead of being in the district attorney's office, if he had his just deserts, would be in the State penitentiary?

I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, have come here and have held public hearings; that among your witnesses you invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistants under the full privilege of testifying before a congressional committee.

That is not true; that statement is absolutely false. I have been for a number of years a Member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and we have invariably held public hearings. I remember that day after day we sat in the Archbald case and in all other cases that were tried before that Committee on the Judiciary and held public hearings, and Archbald was impeached by the Senate of the United States. He said:

That among your witnesses you had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistants.

How are you going to vote? Are you going to cast your vote and say upon the floor of this House that Judge GARD, that CHARLIE CARLIN, that JOHN M. NELSON, in their judicial capacity upon this subcommittee, went to the city of New York and deliberately summoned every rogue that they could lay their hands upon for the deliberate purpose of slandering that district attorney? Whenever you cast a vote in this House against this resolution brought in by this committee you say to this House, you say to Congress, you say to the country, that three Members of this honorable body, GARD, CARLIN, and NELSON, were guilty in that case of summoning rogues to testify in order to discredit this district attorney. I say to you, gentlemen, that you should have the courage of your convictions, and if you vote against this resolution it will be seen whether you have the courage of your convictions or not and will introduce a resolution to expel these Members.

If you vote against this resolution, you deliberately brand these three men. I put this question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. Do you believe that a man or a committee would be guilty, sitting in a judicial capacity, of deliberately and knowingly, as this man Marshall says, summoning rogues and scoundrels to testify against this district attorney to discredit him, should sit in the House of Representatives? If I believed it, I would introduce a resolution to expel them.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am very reluctant to consume even the brief time accorded me upon this subject—a subject which should engage the deliberate, dispassionate, and judicial consideration of this body.

The conduct of the subcommittee and the letter of Mr. Marshall are related, yet I do not think the two acts constitute such unity that in finding for Mr. Marshall the House thereby defames the personal character of the subcommittee. We are considering the letter of Mr. Marshall, and whether or not a contempt of this House is expressed or intended therein. The personality of Mr. Marshall and the personality of the three members of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee should not be contrasted as inducing a conclusion one way or the other on the part of the House. Such an argument unconsciously excites the prejudice of the House in the defense of itself; it deflects us from the proper line of duty; and it dispels that judicial atmosphere which should envelop this House when considering any conduct reflecting upon its dignity. If our dignity has been offended, we should at least protect it by argument, and we should assume a detached point of view in entering upon the consideration of a subject of this character.

I have no purpose to cast any reflection upon the subcommittee; nor have I any purpose to enter a personal defense of Mr. Marshall. The evidence, as disclosed by his letter, establishes one fact very clearly, namely, that he is a man of candor and of courage, two very desirable qualifications for the discharge of the particular duties of his office.

But, Mr. Speaker, my main purpose in rising is to direct the attention of the House to one particular phase of this subject. There is no general law or authority authorizing this House to administer punishment for contempt. The power of this House to punish for contempt must be found in the Constitution itself, and we look in vain in that instrument for any express authorization for the exercise of such a power. Of course every power conferred carries with it auxiliary or subordinate powers in order to make effective the major power granted. Therefore, it is apparent that the inherent power of the House in dealing with contempts necessarily embraces such acts of contempt as would result in an obstruction of the proceedings, or the suspension of the operations, or the administration of the powers of the House itself. Violence or bribery of a Member, recalcitrancy of witnesses, all touch the exercise of the power of this branch of the Government.

The House must necessarily take notice of this character of contempt or its proceedings are obstructed or suspended. But we will have to go far afield of history or record to find that this House or the Senate ever exercised the inherent power to punish for contempt an act consisting only in the criticism, oral or written, of the conduct of either House of Congress or any committee thereof. [Applause.]

It is with regret that I make the observation that few things have so undermined public confidence in the judiciary of America as its exercise of the inherent power of punishing contempts.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will yield with pleasure.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman know that in the case of Anderson against Dunn, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in which it was held that the inherent power existed for contempt——

Mr. MONTAGUE. The Dunn case was overruled by the Kilbourn case, following thereafter.

Mr. MOON. I do not think so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Well, I can not enter into an argument when I only have 10 minutes.

Mr. MOON. What about the case of Nugent against Beale?

Mr. MONTAGUE. What did Nugent do? He did not criticize this House. He did not criticize the Senate. There was no slanderous or libelous criticism by him. He stole the records of the Senate.

Mr. MOON. There are various kinds of contempt.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are many kinds, but I can not follow that aspect of the case now.

Mr. MOON. And the gentleman can proceed with his misinformation to the House.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will leave it to the House to assess or determine the relative misinformation of the gentleman from Tennessee and myself.

I suggested, without successful contradiction or asseveration, that this Congress, or either body of it, has never punished anyone for oral or written criticism of its conduct or of any subcommittee of either body. Now, when a case of that character is cited, you will find one similar to the case we are now considering.

The most approximate analogy is the Duane case, and there the Senate plainly and directly declined to punish Duane for a contempt consisting of a written criticism—a libelous criticism—of that body; but, on the contrary, the Senate requested the President to direct the district attorney to prosecute Duane in the appropriate court of the District of Columbia for the libel, resulting in his conviction. So this case is an obvious precedent against the contention of the report of the special committee.

As I now recall, only two cases are cited as precedents in the report of the special committee. One is the case of Anderson against Dunn, found not only in Hinds' Precedents but, having been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, is found in Sixth Wheaton, 204. The fact of this case is the essential matter for consideration, and this fact was the attempt of Anderson to bribe a Member of the House. Where is the analogy between bribery and criticism? Bribery strikes at the very life of the House; it is an attempt to destroy the very power and duty of representation, and if successfully consummated does as effectually destroy the Representative as if he himself were killed. But this case was sharply criticized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the famous Kilbourn case, whose contempt consisted in his failure to testify in an investigation which Congress had no power to make. The opinion in the latter case was delivered by the great justice, Mr. Justice Miller, in 1880, and is found in One hundred and third United States Reports, page 170. The chief merit of the Kilbourn case, however, consists in largely overruling all the arguments advanced in the Dunn case and solemnly adjudicating that the power of the House of Representatives to punish for contempts is limited to the cases expressly defined by the Constitution. It moreover declared, after an extended historical research, that no precedent could be afforded by the action of the House of Commons of Great Britain in that that particular institution was once a court of judicature and a part of the juridical system of the British Kingdom. Congress is not and never was.

The next case, the second and remaining case cited in the report of the special committee, is that of Nugent against Beale, decided in the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia in May, 1848. But of what this particular contempt consisted is not given in the report.

Briefly, the contempt in this case consisted in Nugent's purloining and making public a copy of a treaty between the United States and Mexico when being considered in the secret executive session of the Senate. In other words, Nugent undertook by means of this physical theft of a paper of great moment to interfere with the consideration and administration of the executive power of the United States Senate. He boldly attempted either to obstruct, impair, or nullify the action of the Senate in relation to a matter effecting the international relations of our country. What possible parallel exists between that case and the one now under consideration by this House? They are as far apart as the poles.

So, Mr. Speaker, I beg again to submit to this House, without fear of successful contradiction, that neither this House nor the Senate has ever heretofore undertaken to exercise jurisdiction in contempt proceedings of a case of the character we are now considering. No slander or libel of this body has ever heretofore been treated as contempt by this body. This statement can not be controverted Therefore we are driven to the unfortunate predicament of making a new law to fit a new case. The report attempts to declare that to be contempt which has never heretofore been adjudged to be contempt by either House of Congress. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we now seek to declare that unlawful which when heretofore done was lawful. Morally and logically, perhaps not technically, we violate the Constitution in that our proceeding now is an ex post facto proceeding. We make that a crime now which was not a crime when committed, and fix as punishment for the crime a punishment which was not prescribed when the act was done. In other words, we create the offense after the act, and prescribe the punishment therefor; we sit at once as judge and prosecutor, a position, I submit, that should never be assumed save under the gravest provocation.

Mr. Speaker, I would now advert to another branch of the case. I am not here to defend all that Mr. Marshall has said. If I had been his advisor, I would have advised him not to write such a letter. But the House made a mistake at the beginning, and I do not think it is too late to correct it, and the sooner we correct it the better. [Applause.]

I have high regard for the subcommittee of this House, but the way to maintain the dignity of this House is not to exercise the power of contempt, but to disregard unjust and unfounded criticism and pursue courageously our conduct as representatives of the people. We may coerce timorous sentiment, we may coerce fear but not affection, and we can never coerce dignity or respect. We must achieve or obtain it by some other means than by the exercise of the summary power of punishing contempt of the kind now under consideration.

I thought Mr. Marshall was unhappy in some of his language. I think when he used the word "purpose" he meant "result." I do not think Mr. Marshall meant that the purpose of the subcommittee in coming to New York was to degrade him. I think he meant that certain things had been permitted by the subcommittee which resulted in destroying the prestige of his office. He said, for instance, that the Member indicted, together with his counsel, sat with the subcommittee and helped largely to conduct the investigation. He says that the subcommittee laid its hand upon every rogue in New York. He is mistaken as to numbers; not every rogue was called, but a goodly number appeared. What he clearly meant is that the subcommittee permitted this to be done, thereby resulting in the impairment if not in the destruction of the usefulness of his office. But we are not dealing in mathematics, in proportions, and relations. I am not criticizing the committee for hearing these witnesses, but I am asking you, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] did, to put yourselves in the place of Mr. Marshall. He found this class of people the chief witnesses and he thought that prolonged countenance of them by the subcommittee tended to destroy the prestige of his office.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, he found this committee making industrious efforts to secure the evidence before the grand jury of his court, evidence the making public of which, in my judgment, would have been a most disastrous misfortune to the country. [Applause.] Here our Government is in the midst of most delicate international relations; here are people indicted in connection with those relations, and yet it is contended the Congress of the United States can strike down the barriers that separate the legislative from the judicial branches of the Government, and put its hands into the grand jury room and expose the testimony therein found to the public gaze of the world. [Applause.] When we do that, gentlemen, we may punish for contempt all we please, but we can not save ourselves from contempt. [Applause.]

Therefore, I submit in conclusion that we should be slow to take to ourselves a jurisdiction and a power which we do not accord to the judiciary of this country. We should not be sensitive of public criticism of ourselves. I suspect that a hundred newspaper editorials were published this morning that are far more drastic in their criticisms than those in Mr. Marshall's letter. If this body has the dignity which some gentlemen speak of—and I would not depreciate its dignity—if I ever had one single compelling thought as to my service in connection with this body, it is that I should not in any way impair its dignity; but if we would maintain its dignity, we can best do so by walking the high road of our own jurisdiction, keeping our self-respect and not noticing criticisms, however violent or unfounded. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I had expected to follow some one speaking on the other side, and am a little embarrassed after so fine a speech on the same side by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia.

Impeachment, and proceedings for contempt, which summon a man to the bar of this House, should stand on the highest possible ground, and be instituted only for great and important public reasons. We do not use a 10-inch cannon to kill a mosquito, and perhaps the strongest Members of this House are those who are least likely to rise to a question of privilege and speak of something that somebody has said about them, no matter how wanton the attack.

We want to put ourselves in the place of our friends on the Judiciary Committee, and the district attorney for the southern district of New York, who, I think, if I have any acquaintance with him, I met only once, years ago. He was, so far as we can judge from his letter, trying to do a great public duty as well as he knew how and under great difficulties. He was investigating complicated international situations. He was finding evidence on matters of great public import and bringing it before the grand jury against all the influences that sometimes conceal such evidence. Of a sudden he was impeached in the House of Representatives, and the gist of the accusations against him, almost all the way through that impeachment, was of false and malicious prosecution, of prostituting his high office to false accusations, of doing it maliciously, and on this charge of malicious prosecution he was impeached by one of the men who were defendants in the prosecutions in New York.

Proceedings for malicious prosecution have a law of their own. It is well known among lawyers that they can not be brought until the original prosecution is determined, because they are founded upon two allegations. One is that the prosecution is unjustifiable. That must first be determined by the verdict. Second, that it is without probable cause. And there is a reason for postponing any such suit for malicious prosecution, and that is that it is not desirable to interfere with the fair trial of the case by asserting that the men engaged in it are malicious, and so no one is allowed to secure an indictment or bring a suit for malicious prosecution until that original prosecution is over. The essence and sense of that rule ought to apply to such a proceeding as this impeachment.

At any rate, if an impeachment is brought and an inquiry is urged while the prosecution is pending, then, under those circumstances, in order not to interfere with the ends of justice in the original cases, the inquiry ought to be confidential. I do not say that evidence in impeachment cases, as to matters far in the past, ought always to be confidential, but in such a case as this there was some reason to feel that it ought to be confidential, so as not to interfere with the trial of the criminal case. There was, at any rate, some reason for the district attorney asking that friends of the defendant should not be called to give evidence against him, which would get into the newspapers and which would take away some of the power of his office. We should not wonder that he was angry and that he lost his head.

And then he was asked to allow the subcommittee to see the evidence before the grand jury. Why, the evidence taken before a grand jury in pending prosecutions can never safely be given away to the public. The State can never give it safely to the public, because then it gives away the evidence on which the trial is to take place, and it certainly could not properly be put before the committee in the presence of the impeaching defendant. There is the case as it comes to us, and I ask you, if any one of you had been trying to do your duty as a district attorney, and found yourself impeded in that way, whether you might not have lost your temper? I ask you now, How would you have felt? Would you have lost your temper or not? Would you have been quite proper in your expressions? The members of this Judiciary Committee are my dear friends. They are the members of a committee of which I was once the chairman. But I ask them, would they have been sure to express themselves with propriety if they felt that their office was being made the subject of an attack, and that their motives were said to be malicious, and people were able to use these statements in their home town? Perhaps we may pardon this district attorney for losing his temper.

Now, what is the remedy? is the question before us. Some forms of expression that he has used are certainly subject to being called contempt. There is no doubt about that.

But his whole letter, taken altogether, is a protest, and a violent protest, against injustice which he thought was being done to the cause of justice. As I once heard a court say, when determining the sentence in a libel proceeding, the man was intemperate in the pursuit of temperance. I say that if Mr. Marshall was unjust he was unjust in the pursuit of justice.

Now, what shall we do as sensible men? Newspapers sometimes commit the most tremendous and wanton attacks upon Members of this House and sometimes on the House itself. In such a case a dignified presentment of the facts is made by a Member before the House and we are satisfied. Did you ever hear of summoning an editor here? The dignity of the House would not permit the summoning of the editor of a newspaper to the bar of this House, except in the gravest case, if at all. We prefer to let the transaction speak for itself. Here we have a seemingly honest man who has lost his temper. Will the dignity of the House suffer us to bring him here for rebuke for losing his temper when he is in the pursuit of justice? If we will not do it for a wanton attack, do not let us do it where the man is really in earnest. Do not let us thereby raise a dispute between the whole House of Representatives and a United States district attorney, who represents the Executive in doing justice, in a matter which will, I think, in the end only make the House ridiculous.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] have 10 minutes, not to be taken out of the allotted time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] have 10 minutes, not to be charged up to the 4 hours.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already had 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but it was understood that more time would be granted if necessary.

Mr. MOON. I am not objecting at all; I am simply suggesting that the gentleman has already consumed a good deal of time on this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I shall not probably consume the entire 10 minutes, but I would like to say before the debate is closed, so far as I am involved in that debate, that no one will or can say more that will be respectful and considerate of the committee—I refer to the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee—than I will, and no one will excel me in personal regard for the membership of that committee, and I do not consider that it is impugning them or putting them on trial when I speak as I have done with respect to the position of Mr. Marshall.

This is not an issue in which you must either convict Mr. Marshall of contempt or convict the subcommittee of misconduct, and the gentlemen who argue along that line are laboring under a very great error. The charge here is that Mr. Marshall is guilty of a contempt of this House, and the answer to that is that if there are circumstances which would appear to warrant a sane and reasonable man in reaching the conclusion which he did about what was going on, then he was guilty of no contempt in reciting those facts back to the subcommittee.

Briefly and in a few words let me ask you to recall the origin of this proceeding. It originated by a man who was under investigation and subsequently indicted. When the subcommittee sat in Washington they sat with closed doors; when they came to New York they sat with open doors. I do not question their right to do either or both of these things, but that is a fact which an outside observer, looking on, would have to take notice of.

Mr. Marshall knew that they had counsel for the gentleman who made the accusation and counsel for some of the others named in the accusation, meeting and speaking and conferring with the committee at times. He knew that what these people—who were his enemies because in the discharge of his duty, the administration of his office, he was obliged to prosecute them—were willing to state anything and everything that would tend to villify and bring him and his administration into discredit and disrepute, and that these things were being made public through the public press.

What did Mr. Marshall do? Does Mr. Marshall write this letter attacking the committee? No; but, as I ventured to point out this morning, at a cruicial moment, when a newspaper man with whom he had conversed was practically arrested, he came to the front and assumed the responsibility for what had been said to that man, out of which the article he published was made up. When he wrote this letter to the committee—remember, gentlemen, he is not writing a letter of accusation against the committee; he is simply telling the committee that in that conversation with the reporter he said this and he said that. Was there not basis enough from the facts I have recited to warrant any reasonable and honorable man, sensitive of his honor, in saying to himself, "Well, this looks like an effort to hinder and impede the administration of justice," coming, as it does, from the man accused, and the committee seemed to call his witnesses, as well as others, allowing these damaging things to be said to go out to the press and be published to the world? I say that man had a reasonable ground for what he did. You take any case of malicious prosecution, for instance, and the inquiry is not, Are the things true? but Had the man who brought the suit the right to believe that they were true? and if that is so, no damage will be allowed. I say the analogy here as between such a case and this is most complete and perfect. The only thing to be determined is were the facts which appeared to this man, who was discharging his duty under great pressure, such as to warrant him in believing that they would tend to hinder and impede the administration of justice.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM. No; I can not yield; I have not the time. I say if they did, then when you take into consideration human nature the man was justified to write and complain, as any other man would be who had the courage and honor, and especially when he was telling what had taken place between himself and the reporter, largely in the latter's defense.

I tell you that the dignity of this House is not to be maintained by such proceedings. This will not add one item to the glory or honor or one touch to the dignity of you or any future Congress to maintain such a proceeding as this. What ought to be done with this report is not to find fault with the members of the committee, for they had the right to reach upon the technicalities the conclusions which they have presented to you, but we ought to say to you, in the language of the law, "De minimus non curat lex"—it is too small for the court to notice; let us lay the whole matter upon the table and let it rest there in innocuous desuetude for all time. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just taken his seat, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], is one of the most distinguished lawyers in this body; but when he, in response to my question this morning, said that this House in directing this committee to investigate the facts concerning this impeachment had done all that it was in its power to do, he answered his own argument. There have been a great many things said upon this subject that have no bearing upon it. We have even been accused here of attempting to suppress free speech. Gentlemen who say that do not comprehend the nature and character of these proceedings. This House named three of its most distinguished Members, members of the great Committee on the Judiciary, and sent them to the city of New York on a mission to perform a solemn duty of this House and its Members. Mr. Snowden Marshall says that they went up there to malign and vilify and disgrace him. I say that that statement is false and that he knew it was false when he made it. What can the House do when a Member here rises upon his own personal and official responsibility and solemnly impeaches an officer of the United States? It can proceed in an orderly way to have the charge investigated, just exactly as we did in this case. Unless this House is prepared to protect its committees charged with the responsible duties of investigating cases pending before the House I do not know how we are to proceed. If a man has a case pending before a court in which there is an able and upright judge presiding, and he has a weak case, he could go out on the street and malign and vilify that judge and say that he is dishonest and prejudiced and will not give him a fair trial, and that the judge intends to decide against him and to disgrace him. He can thus evade a trial and obstruct the administration of justice, as was done in this case. This House must protect its committees that it charges with the performance of important public duties from the abuse and calumny of those whose official conduct it is called upon to investigate.

It is not a question of Mr. Marshall going out on the streets or to the newspapers and slandering the Members or the House itself. What he says about individual Members of this House, or of the House as a body, is not of very much consequence. We are charged with all sorts of motives here generally, but this was a specific charge that challenged the honesty and integrity of the Judiciary Committee and of this House itself in its investigation of a matter pending before it. Another distinguished lawyer in this body, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], has questioned the jurisdiction, and has said that if this were a judicial proceeding the United States attorney would not be liable for contempt. Mr. Marshall, the man who wrote these letters, does not agree with him. He says, on page 73 of this record:

I have devoted considerable thought to the question of whether this subcommittee was sitting in a judicial capacity, because I would willingly agree that if such were the case it would have been improper for me to make the comments on their conduct which I made in my letter. I am convinced that they were not sitting in a judicial capacity in any sense of the word.

He does not agree with Mr. SHERLEY upon that question. I say that they were performing judicial functions. They were performing a solemn duty on behalf of this House and on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, and they had a right to proceed in the performance of their duty uninterrupted by anything the defendant had to say to the newspapers on the subject, for he has no right to villify and malign a committee of this House in order to hinder, obstruct, and delay its proceedings, and that was the only purpose and effect of it, and could have been its only purpose and effect. [Applause.]

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], in addition to the 10 minutes to which he is already entitled.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I think we shall make a mistake if we vote on this serious resolution through any feeling of resentment toward Mr. BUCHANAN or to any feeling of hostility toward Mr. Marshall. It is a plain legal question, which we ought to decide without having our feelings aroused and without resentment or partiality. I feel that in this discussion such has crept in, yet there is not 1 per cent of the membership of the House who know Mr. Marshall, while all of us do know Mr. BUCHANAN. Whether Mr. BUCHANAN is guilty of conspiracy to impede interstate-commerce traffic has nothing to do with your verdict to-day. Whether Mr. Marshall is guilty of the charges made by Mr. BUCHANAN upon the 14th day of December last, and enlarged upon on the 12th day of January last, has nothing to do with your verdict this afternoon; and I hope that we will not get those questions mixed in our minds when we come to vote on the resolution. On the 14th day of December Mr. BUCHANAN, a Member of the House—let us forget that he was indicted or was to be indicted; he was not indicted then—rose in his responsible position upon the floor and impeached Mr. Marshall of high crimes and misdemeanors. On the 28th of December last an indictment was handed down by the grand jury of New York against Mr. BUCHANAN and four or five others, charging conspiracy under the antitrust laws; and on the 12th of January Mr. BUCHANAN, with 40 charges, reimpeached and supplemented the charges against Mr. Marshall. An effort was made to have the investigation, which did take place later, begin immediately, and I for one opposed that. I wanted the Committee on the Judiciary to look into the matter and see if there was any probable cause for this investigation, a very serious matter, because in the matter of impeachment the House of Representatives, sitting as a grand inquest of the Nation, is the highest court in the world, and it is a very serious matter to originate impeachment charges against any civil officer of the United States. I resisted the effort to have the investigation ordered immediately. It was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and later, on the 27th day of January, at the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I asked the House of Representatives to give us power to subpœna witnesses and to examine them.

That resolution, No. 110, was passed in this House unanimously, authorizing the Judiciary Committee or any subcommittee thereof to subpœna witnesses, to take testimony in further investigation and consideration of House resolution 90, which was Mr. BUCHANAN'S resolution impeaching Mr. Marshall.

Now, my friend from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] says we made a mistake when we did that. I submit, gentlemen, it is not fair for the Congress or the House to make a mistake and send its committee forward under that authority and let them come back after having done their duty according to your command, and then censure them. It is like a general sending his brave boys to the front, where some of them get shot, and when those who are not killed come back to censure them for carrying out his commands.

We realize it was a difficult and unpleasant duty. We realized that the public would get into their minds that Mr. BUCHANAN was indicted and that Mr. Marshall was the district attorney who was going to prosecute him. I submit to you that your committee had confidence that they would do the right thing wherever they went and under whatever circumstances they were placed.

Now, for four, five, or six days that committee, or rather I will say in the beginning, to be very frank with you, we believed that nine-tenths of the Judiciary Committee, if they had any sympathies in their breasts, were sympathetic with Mr. Marshall. I speak of myself as one. We started out here in Washington and brought distinguished citizens from New York, but it developed around the committee table that two or three witnesses who intended to testify against Mr. Marshall were not witnesses of the best repute, and this committee, desiring to protect Mr. Marshall, held those hearings behind closed doors in order that this testimony, which some member of the committee reflected upon as coming from certain witnesses, might not be made public, and thereby not injure the arm of the district attorney's office for the southern district of New York.

There was no disposition on the part of any member of this committee or subcommittee to persecute or prosecute this man, but under the inquisitorial powers of Congress the duty of a committeeman who goes out to investigate impeachment charges is a very unpleasant one. I have served on these committees, and I know the workings of them. We sat for days and days and days in the case of a distinguished United States judge; for weeks and weeks and for months we went through an investigation of Judge Archbald, of Pennsylvania, and a more painful duty I never performed, and I say to you now, gentlemen, without a particle of bias or feeling, that I have read every word of this testimony in the Marshall case or heard it, and the questions this subcommittee asked during the conduct of this investigation, I tell you, are as mild as a zephyr compared to a Kansas cyclone as compared with the conduct of the Judiciary Committee in the investigation of Judge Archbald. I remember in the Archbald case we had a lawyer from Scranton, Pa., whom some of the committee did not think was telling the whole truth, and we grilled him for a whole day, seven long hours, and that poor fellow when he went off the stand actually fainted and had to be carried to a street car. But that is the only method by which we can get rid of an unworthy officer, and when you start the impeachment machinery in motion it is the duty of the committee to go to the bottom of the matter in the investigation if they carry out their duty as it should be carried out as the Constitution says, because the Constitution says that Congress shall have the sole power of impeachment. It is not a common court; it is the most distinguished court in the world. It is acting as a quasi judicial body, and the quasi judicial character of this House followed this committee when it was in New York. I am not here to defend the subcommittee; it needs no defense. As I say, I have read every word of the testimony taken in New York——

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MOON. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this committee was acting in a judicial capacity?

Mr. WEBB. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MOON. Are the holdings all that way?

Mr. WEBB. Undoubtedly. The Constitution says it shall have the sole power of trying and the sole power of impeachment. You can not impeach except by a trial.

Mr. MOON. Will not the gentleman yield to me for just one moment in order that I may read one sentence?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MOON (reading)—

I have devoted considerable thought to the question of whether this subcommittee was sitting in a judicial capacity, because I would willingly agree that if such were the case it would have been improper for me to make the comments on their conduct which I made in my letter.

That is in Mr. Marshall's brief. That is the written statement of Mr. Marshall.

Mr. WEBB. An impeachment trial is not only judicial, but sometimes a judgment is rendered that a person shall hold no office under the United States Government as long as he lives.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not true that all of our hearings in these cases of Archbald and the others were held in public?

Mr. WEBB. Well, the first time in the last 12 years—the last 14 years—that any evidence, so far as I know, was held behind closed doors under a resolution of this sort was in the Marshall case. I think that is correct. The hearings were public in the Swayne case in Florida. They were public in the Washington Hanford case. They were public in the Judge Dayton case, and they were public in the Archbald case. They were public in Judge Wright's case, and they were public, most of them, in Mr. Marshall's case.

Now, there has been some complaint that one of the lawyers went around with the subcommittee to New York. Well, that is a matter of taste, gentlemen, but a question of taste has nothing whatever to do with your verdict this afternoon.

I do say that every time a man impeaches another on the floor of this House, the Member, of course, who does it, follows up that impeachment. It was done in the case of Mr. Lamar, in the Swayne impeachment proceedings, and was done by Mr. NEELY when he impeached Judge Dayton, and also two lawyers. But Judge Dayton did not write to the House of Representatives that the whole thing was a matter of bad taste, nor did he slander the whole body or the subcommittee. He took his medicine like a man, and went on the stand and testified, and when the committee reported they acquitted Judge Dayton. That is what ought to have been done in this case. In the Archbald case an official of the Department of Justice sat with the committee all the while; in the Speer case an agent of the Department of Justice went with the committee to Georgia. This House is not bound by any rules of evidence in these great impeachment trials. Necessarily the committee must be inquisitorial. They were trying to find out certain facts, and all they did was to try to get at the bottom of them so that they could report. When they went to New York they did not go there in any spirit of hostility. The charge had been made in the impeachment that indictments had been found without sufficient evidence, and that Mr. Marshall had been acting corruptly in securing them. The first thing the committee asked of Mr. Marshall was if they could see the minutes of the grand jury, and stated that they would be kept strictly confidential. Their main object in going to New York was to determine the fact of whether or not any testimony was taken in the grand jury in finding its indictments.

The committee thought that the quickest and surest way to discover this fact was to investigate the minutes. Mr. Marshall declined to give them the minutes. There is much said about the grand jury minutes. So far as I am concerned, I believe the House of Representatives in prosecuting an impeachment trial has power to go into any sanctum in the world that any other court has the power to go into.

Mr. Marshall telegraphed here to the Attorney General about it, and the Attorney General thought that they should not be given to the subcommittee, and that committee did not issue a subpœna duces tecum, but dropped that line of inquiry. They called before them some of the members of the grand jury to find out if evidence was taken. They did not ask them what the evidence was. The idea of keeping the grand jury proceedings secret is to keep from the public idle talk about things, but whenever a grand juror is summoned before a competent tribunal to testify, he is bound to do it, and no oath prohibits him from doing it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Has not the district attorney testified that they had some excuse in thinking that some improper use might be made of the minutes because of the relations which you have spoken of, of BUCHANAN and his attorney, being with them?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so, my friend. I do not think it is fair for any man who is being investigated to assume such thing.

Mr. GRAHAM. Might not a man honestly make some inference and not be guilty of contempt?

Mr. WEBB. It might be thought so, but it is bad judgment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will advise the gentleman that he has five minutes remaining.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did not the Attorney General direct the district attorney not to reveal the proceedings of the grand jury?

Mr. WEBB. The minutes of the grand jury. And the committee never wanted to find out what was sworn to in the grand jury. They found that Samuel Gompers and other gentlemen testified but made no effort to ascertain what their testimony was. The questions that this subcommittee asked in New York are such as could be asked in any impeachment investigation.

Mr. GRAHAM. You say that they got no further than to try to get the minutes of the grand jury, but they interrogated the grand jury about that, and they also asked them why they indicted one man and excused another, and all those questions.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; but they never drew a particle of testimony from any living grand juror in the Buchanan case or any other case. They asked them of the method of indicting them, but it had no reference to this particular case, and they drew out no testimony that was taken before the grand jury in the Buchanan indictment.

Now, gentlemen, I will go still further. I did not want the committee to insist upon the grand-jury minutes. I knew it was a delicate matter, but I want this House to bear in mind that under an impeachment charge it is the highest court in the world and it has the power, if any court on earth has the power, to go into the grand-jury room and inquire into anything they please that is pertinent to the charges under investigation.

Mr. BENNET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I yield.

Mr. BENNET. Did this committee in any way attempt to obtain testimony through grand jurors that had been given before them as grand jurors?

Mr. WEBB. They did not. They studiously avoided that very thing. They wanted to come back here and report on this charge, and they did their best to report on it. They never elicited what the testimony was or its character.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that this man Holme that this district attorney is referring to was a British subject and not an American citizen?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that, except what dropped out on the testimony.

Mr. THOMAS. The record shows that?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; the record shows that.

Mr. GRAHAM. Did they not ask them for their reasons for acting one way with respect to one defendant and another way with respect to another?

Mr. WEBB. But not with respect to this defendant. They were then examining the general way of finding indictments, as suggested by Mr. Wise. Mr. Wise practically said that the grand jury was worthless anyhow.

Mr. GRAHAM. The part I was referring to was where they were interrogating about this particular case. And would not those very questions necessarily require them to give answers as to the evidence?

Mr. WEBB. No; they did not give any answers as to the testimony. I wish my friend would put his finger upon any particle of testimony from any witness as to what took place before the grand jury in the Buchanan indictment case or any other case. The only particle of testimony as to what might have been testified there was given by Mr. Bielaski, and he did not say that was given to the grand jury.

Now, gentlemen, when this committee went to New York, if Mr. Marshall had done as Judge Speer or Judge Dayton or other gentlemen did who have been impeached, and had said, "Come along, gentlemen, I have nothing to fear; I want to be at your service; I want you to make a thorough investigation; I am conscious of my own rectitude," instead of meeting them in a hostile spirit, as the committee says he did, this investigation would have been concluded long ago, and none of this trouble would have ensued. I am afraid Mr. Marshall, when he wrote this letter, got his ideas from garbled newspaper reports. I do not believe he had read the testimony taken before the subcommittee when he wrote this letter; but having once written it, he said, "I am not going to take anything back"; and he made a bad matter worse when he finally appeared before the select committee which has reported this resolution to-day.

This subcommittee sat in New York Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, and on Saturday they were getting ready to leave. On Saturday afternoon they got this letter. They got their first knowledge of it from the newspapers, before the chairman received it. It is not necessary for me to pick out the contemptuous language of the letter. Everybody admits it. Nobody denies it. It is contemptuous. It was written, it seems to me, in the most violent and disrespectful spirit, for the purpose of disgracing the subcommittee and, if possible, driving them out of New York under a cloud of disgrace.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee have 10 minutes more, if he wants it, to continue this discussion.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 11 minutes.

Mr. MOON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee yields to the gentleman from North Carolina five minutes additional. Is that satisfactory to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more, not to be charged to the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina have five minutes more in addition to the time yielded him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. I can close in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. Just a little of the language of the letter, now:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

Is there any man, any apologist for Mr. Marshall, who will say that that charge is true?

You had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me.

I ask any Member here if that charge is true? Does any man believe it?

I told him that you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with Buchanan's counsel, Walsh and David Slade, in constant conference with you. I said that I believed that every word of the evidence, whether in so-called secret sessions or not, had been placed at the disposal of these worthies, and that I would be just as willing to give the grand jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee.

* * * * * * *

I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant; how you had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered.

Is there any man in this House who will say that this subcommittee "rushed" to the defense of anybody?

I realized that your effort was to ruin me and my office by publishing with your full approval the complaints of various persons who have run afoul of the criminal law under my administration.

I ask you if there is a man here who believes that charge is true?

I propose to make this letter public.

And he did make it public before it was received by the subcommittee. Now, this man Holme said that it was the belief of the district attorney's office that it was the aim of the congressional investigation to put a stop to the criminal investigation of the pro-German partisans. Mr. Marshall did not deny that he said that. He did not admit that he said that, but Holme said that was the belief of the district attorney's office.

No man in this House believes that statement true. Now, having agreed all of us—I believe my friend the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] and all the rest of those who spoke in defense of Mr. Marshall agree that the letter is contemptuous. If it is contemptuous of the committee, it is contemptuous of you, because the power of the House with all of its dignity followed that committee to New York; because you went up there, it is your committee carrying out your mandate. It is not fair to say that you made a mistake, and when the committee comes back criticize them for having gone on your mandate.

If there is anything well settled in the history of this country in its judicature, it is that the House of Representatives and the Senate have an inherent power to punish for contempt. It has been done in numerous cases. I will set them out in the RECORD if I have permission to extend my remarks.

In the case of Anderson against Dunn, already cited, the opinion in which was written by Judge Johnson, and on that bench were Judge Story and Judge Marshall, in a unanimous opinion of the court, except Judge Washington, who was sick at the time, they set out in the strongest language that the House does have the inherent power to punish for contempt.

In that opinion he says:

This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with the care of all that is dear to them, composed of the most distinguished citizens selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great Nation, whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire, that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested.

In Kilbourn against Thompson (103 U. S.) the Supreme Court decided in that particular case that Congress had no authority to appoint a committee to investigate into the private affairs of a real estate company in Washington; that that was a judicial proceeding, and Congress had no power to investigate it, and therefore that the arrest was unlawful. And even there Judge Miller, writing the opinion of the court, said that there may be some doubt about the right to make an investigation, but there was no doubt in regard to trials of election cases given by the Constitution and the trial of impeachment cases given by the Constitution.

Let us go a little further. In One hundred and sixth United States, in re Chapman, this language by the Supreme Court, the last utterance upon this question, is found. The opinion was written by Chief Justice Fuller:

While Congress can not divest either of its Houses of the inherent power to punish for contempt, it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House, and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States.

We can not even divest ourselves of the inherent power to punish for contempt. There Congress made a law in 1857 punishing witnesses who would not answer questions by an investigating committee. The Supreme Court says you can commit two offenses; that Congress, the House and the Senate, can pass a law making it a misdemeanor to refuse to answer, and each House has the authority, if that has been violated, to punish for contempt in addition. In other words, there are two distinct offenses. Chief Justice Fuller said:

Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds expel a Member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection.

That is the inherent power to punish for contempt.

Now, gentlemen, as I said, if there is anything that is well settled in the history of this country, it is that the legislative branches of this Congress can punish for contempt. And if there is any doubt about it in the ordinary legislative committee investigation the courts have all declared that there is no doubt about it when it comes to the tremendous power of the House of Representatives given by the Constitution of the United States to try and prosecute impeachments.

Now, I have said briefly all that I care to say. I regret very much that this matter ever arose, but it is before us and we should face it like men. We may hate to vote to find this man in contempt, but, gentlemen, this is a question of guilt and not a question of punishment. That will come later. If he is guilty we ought to say so, and then, if there is anything to palliate the situation, if there is anything which will go to mitigate it, that will come before the House when we pass upon the punishment, whether it shall be a reprimand or that he shall go without day or be imprisoned. All we have to do is to adopt the resolution, and when we meet in the future we can take into account the circumstances under which he wrote the letter, and if out of the goodness of your hearts you want to let him off, why you can do it, but that comes hereafter. The plain question is whether he is guilty of contempt of the House. If you believe he is, adopt the resolution.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman said that we all admit that he is guilty of contempt. Does not the gentleman from North Carolina admit that we have not a definition of what is contempt?

Mr. WEBB. Judges Story and Marshall have said that there is no court in the world that can formulate and define contempt, but that is at last left to the House itself to determine in each case whether there is contempt. I thank the House for extending my time. [Applause.]

On December 14, 1915, Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN, of Illinois, rose on the floor of the House and impeached H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for the southern district of New York. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. Charges referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, p. 259.)

On January 12, 1916, Hon. FRANK BUCHANAN, of Illinois, again arose and impeached H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for the southern district of New York, offered a resolution (H. Res. 90), and asked that it then be considered by the House. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1044–1052.)

On January 27, 1916, the House passed a resolution (H. Res. 110) authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary in further considering House resolution 90 to send for persons and papers, to subpœna witnesses, to administer oaths to such witnesses, and take their testimony. Also authorizing said committee to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for said committee. In case such subcommittee is appointed it shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are given to the Committee on the Judiciary, and so forth. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1830.)

On January 31, 1916, the Committee on the Judiciary, in regular session, made the following order:

That the chairman appoint a subcommittee of three to execute the purposes of House resolution 110, and that said subcommittee use its own discretion as to the scope of its inquiries covering the charges under examination and the place or places of discharging its duties, and report the result of its investigation, with all evidence taken by it, to the full committee.

On February 1, 1916, the chairman, in open session of the committee, announced the appointment of Messrs. CHARLES C. CARLIN, WARREN GARD, and JOHN M. NELSON as said subcommittee.

While the special subcommittee were continuing their investigation in New York City, as authorized under House resolution 110, Hon. CHARLES C. CARLIN, chairman subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, received from H. Snowden Marshall, United States attorney, a letter dated March 4, which letter it is alleged to be a violation of prerogatives of the House and contemptuous.

This letter was brought to the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary, and by this committee to the attenion of the House.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A CONTEMPT OF THE HOUSE?

Is the language used in this letter such as to warrant the House in citing H. Snowden Marshall to appear before the House to show cause why he should not be adjudged in contempt?

This is a question that must address itself to the wisdom of the House, as it admits of no precise definition. Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Anderson against Dunn, says:

Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within that district. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes, and was intended by the Constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the General Government; but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts, and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet contempt might be reasonably applied.

In the case of Nugent against Beale, decided in the Circuit Court for the District of Columbia, Chief Justice Cranch, in his opinion, holds that every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts.

HAS THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES THE POWER TO PUNISH FOR CONTEMPT IN SUCH A CASE?

* * * and [the House of Representatives] shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Constitution of the United States, Art. I, sec. 2, par. 5.)

It may be observed in the outset that there is no constitutional provision granting, in terms, to the House of Representatives the power to punish for contempts others than its own Members, but it has been so often and so uniformly held that the House has such implied power, when the contempt arises out of a matter which the House is empowered to act upon by the Constitution, that it seems firmly established.

This implied power was recognized as existing by Chief Justice Marshall. In the great opinion of McCulloch v. Maryland, delivered in 1818, he says (4 Wheaton, p. 420):

We admit, as all must admit, that the powers of the Government are limited, and that its limits are not to be transcended. But we think the sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the National Legislature that discretion, with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to the end, which are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

THE CASE OF WILLIAM DUANE.

The question of the power of the Senate to punish for contempt arose in 1800 in the case of William Duane over a publication in the General Advertiser or Aurora, which was found to be false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, and Duane was found to be in contempt of the Senate. He appeared before the Senate in response to first notice but failed, and declined to appear when ordered at a second date. This being at the end of the session, on the last day of the session he was ordered prosecuted by the courts of law, and was prosecuted and punished. (Vol. 2 Hinds, sec. 1604.)

ANDERSON V. DUNN.

[1818 (6 Wheat., 204).]

In 1818 the House of Representatives asserted and maintained its right to punish for contempt John Anderson for attempting to bribe a Member. He was arrested, convicted, and punished.

[Vol. 2, Hinds', sec. 1606.]

Thereafter John Andrews brought an action against the Sergeant at Arms of the House for trespass, alleging an assault and battery and false imprisonment by the Sergeant at Arms. Judgment upon a demurrer was entered for the defendant, and by a writ of error the case was carried to the United States Supreme Court. This case involved the question of the right of the House of Representatives to punish for contempt, and the Supreme Court sustained the action of the House.

Mr. Justice Johnson, in delivering the opinion for the court, said in part:

It is certainly true that there is no power given by the Constitution to either House to punish for contempts, except when committed by their own Members. Nor does the judicial or criminal power given to the United States in any part expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House or any one coordinate branch of the Government. Shall we, therefore, decide that no such power exists?

It is true that such a power, if it exists, must be derived from implication, and the genius and spirit of our institutions are hostile to the exercise of implied powers. Had the faculties of man been competent to the framing of a system of government which would have left nothing to implication, it can not be doubted that the effort would have been made by the framers of the Constitution. But what is the fact? There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument a grant of powers which does not draw after it others; not expressed, but vital to their exercise; not substantive and independent, indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate.

The idea is Utopian that Government can exist without leaving the exercise of discretion somewhere. Public security against the abuse of such discretion must rest on responsibility and stated appeals to public approbation. Where all power is derived from the people, and public functionaries at short intervals deposit it at the feet of the people, to be resumed again only at their will, individual fears may be alarmed by the monsters of imagination, but individual liberty can be in little danger.

* * * * * * *

It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempts; but it does not follow from this circumstance that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute or not in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend; on the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution or a legislative declaration, that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment.

* * * * * * *

But what is the alternative? The argument obviously leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy may meditate against it. [This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with the care of all that is dear to them; composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great Nation, whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire; that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested.] And, accordingly, to avoid the pressure of these considerations, it has been argued that the right of the respective Houses to exclude from their presence, and their absolute control within their own walls, carry with them the right to punish contempts committed in their presence, while the absolute legislative power given to Congress within this district enables them to provide by law against all other insults against which there is any necessity for providing.

It is to be observed that, so far as the issue of this case is implicated, this argument yields all right of the plaintiff in error to a decision in his favor, for, non constat, from the pleadings, but that this warrant issued for an offense committed in the immediate presence of the House.

Nor is it immaterial to note what difficulties the negation of this right in the House of Representatives draws after it when it is considered that the concession of the power, if exercised within their walls, relinquishes the great grounds of the argument, to wit, the want of an express grant and the unrestricted and undefined nature of the power here set up. For why should the House be at liberty to exercise an ungranted, an unlimited, and undefined power within their walls any more than without them? If the analogy with individual right and power be resorted to, it will reach no further than to exclusion, and it requires no exuberance of imagination to exhibit the ridiculous consequences which might result from such a restriction imposed upon the conduct of a deliberative assembly.

SAMUEL HOUSTON.

[Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, sec. 1616, etc.]

In 1832 Samuel Houston was tried by the House for contempt, found in contempt, and censured. The contempt consisted in his having assaulted a Member of Congress near his boarding house for something said on the floor of the House.

JOHN NUGENT.

[Hinds' Precedents, vol. 2, p. 1110.]

John Nugent was arraigned before the Senate in 1848 for a breach of the privileges of the Senate, tried, found guilty, and committed.

A petition to the court for a discharge on writ of habeas corpus brought the case into the circuit court of the District of Columbia.

The contempt complained of was that John Nugent caused to be published a treaty pending in executive session of the Senate.

CASE OF THADDEUS HYATT.

In 1859 the Senate appointed a committee to inquire into the facts "attending the late invasion and seizure of the armory and arsenal at Harpers Ferry," etc. (known as the John Brown raid). Hyatt refused to answer certain questions in the course of the investigation, was found in contempt of the Senate, and imprisoned. Mr. Sumner earnestly contended against the jurisdiction of the Senate to punish for contempt in such cases, and while a motion to discharge Hyatt from custody was under consideration he took occasion to address the Senate upon the question. With his deep conviction that the Senate did not possess this implied power, he yet admitted that the House had the power in cases of impeachment, as shown by the following extract:

To the House of Representatives are given inquisitorial powers expressly by the Constitution, while no such powers are given to the Senate. This is expressed in the words "the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment." Here, then, obviously, is something delegated to the House, and not delegated to the Senate, namely, those inquiries which are in their nature preliminary to an impeachment—which may or may not end in impeachment; and since, by the Constitution, every "civil officer" of the General Government may be impeached the inquisitorial powers of the House may be directed against every "civil officer," from the President to the lowest on the list. (Vol. 12, S. Misc. Doc., p. 293.)

JOHN NUGENT V. ROBERT BEALE, SERGEANT AT ARMS.

[Cranch's Reports, D. C., vol. 12, p. 601, S. Misc. Docs.]

Petition for discharge on writ of habeas corpus. (S. Misc. Docs., p. 601.)

Cranch, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court (Circuit Court of the District of Columbia).

The principal questions are:

1. Has the Senate of the United States jurisdiction and power to punish contempts of its authority? And if so,

2. Whether this court, upon this habeas corpus, can inquire into the question of contempt and discharge the prisoner.

On the first question the court says:

"The jurisdiction of the Senate in cases of contempt of its authority depends upon the same grounds and reasons upon which the acknowledged jurisdiction of other judicial tribunals rests, to wit, the necessity of such a jurisdiction to enable the Senate to exercise its high constitutional functions—a necessity at least equal to that which supports the like jurisdiction which has been exercised by all judicial tribunals and legislative assemblies in this country from its first settlement and in England from time immemorial. That the Senate of the United States may punish contempts of its authority seemed to be admitted by the prisoner's counsel, provided it be in a case within their cognizance and jurisdiction, but whether admitted or not, such is the law as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheaton, 224, and in Kearney's case, 7 Wheaton, 41."

"* * * The Crown has no rights which it can exercise otherwise than by process of law and through amenable officers, but representative bodies must necessarily vindicate their authority by means of their own, and those means lie in the process of committal for contempt. This applies not to the houses of Parliament only, but as we observed in Burdett v. Abbott, 14 East, 138, to the courts of justice, which, as well as the house, must be liable to continual obstruction and insult if they were not intrusted with such powers. It is unnecessary to discuss the question whether each house of Parliament be or be not a court; it is clear they can not exercise their proper functions without the power of protecting themselves against interference." (See p. 615. Misc. Docs.)

CONSTITUTION, ARTICLE I, SECTION 5.

It is true that by the Constitution, Article I, section 5, "each House may determine the rules of its proceeding, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member," but it says nothing of contempts. These were left to the operation of the common-law principle that every court has a right to protect itself against insult and contempt, without which right of self-protection they could not discharge their high and important duties. It is not at all probable that the framers of the Constitution, by giving an express power to the Senate to punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and even to expel a Member, intended to deprive the Senate of that protection from insult which they knew very well belonged to and was enjoyed by both Houses of Parliament and the legislatures of the former Colonies and now States of the Union. The provision of the Constitution may have been intended to remove a doubt whether a Member of the Senate, appointed by and responsible to a State legislature, could be guilty of a contempt to a body of which he himself was a Member; or it may have been intended to apply only to such disorderly behavior as did not amount to a contempt of the House; or to remove a doubt whether the Senate had power to expel a Member. But, whatever may have been the intention, we think the provision does not justify an inference that their power to punish for contempt can be executed only upon Members of the Senate (p. 617).

Continuing on this subject, and to the same effect, the opinion quotes from Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 225) (p. 617).

POWER OF COURTS TO PUNISH CONTEMPTS.

In this same quotation argues that courts have this inherent and implied power to punish for contempt:

It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested by express statute provision with power to fine and imprison for contempts, but it does not follow from this circumstance that they could not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute * * * on the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right as incidental to a grant of judicial power (p. 618).

The following is also quoted from Anderson v. Dunn:

The alternative of denying this power leads to the total annihilation of the power of the House of Representatives to guard itself from contempts and leaves it exposed to every indignity and interruption that rudeness, caprice, or even conspiracy may meditate against it. This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with a care of all that is dear to them, composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great Nation, whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire—that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested (p. 618).

CASE OF RICHARD B. IRWIN.

[1874, House of Representatives.]

Committee on Ways and Means were charged with the investigation of certain allegations against the Pacific Mail Steamship Co. Richard B. Irwin had, without sufficient excuse, neglected to appear before the committee, whereupon he was found in contempt and ordered into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms to be kept in his custody in the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Writ of habeas corpus issued.

Case came before Justice McArthur, who declined to release prisoner and upheld the rights of the House to punish for contempt. (Sen. Misc. Doc., p. 521.)

There can be no doubt that either House of Congress has the right of committing for contempts—all contempts which infringe upon the order, the dignity, or the purity of their legislation, and for this purpose it is not denied but that they have the power of examination, of investigation, and of calling witnesses into their presence or before their committees, and of administering oaths and putting inquiries and of punishing a refusal to answer. These powers of the House are so very clearly established now that the learned counsel has not impeached them, unless Congress, by the enactment of 1857, has abrogated this almost indispensable power in Congress. (Concludes that Congress has not so abrogated this right.)

Thinks Congress can only hold prisoner until end of session. Thinks proper that courts review case under writ of habeas corpus.

Brief of Hon. Shellabarger reviews the entire subject of the right of Congress to punish for contempt and cites the authorities. (See pp. 523–535.)

CASE OF HALLET KILBOURN.

[House of Representatives, 1876, 2 Hinds, No. 1608–11.]

In 1876 the House of Representatives passed a resolution to investigate the business affairs of Jay Cooke & Co., a bankrupt concern of which the United States was a creditor, and along with it an alleged real estate pool. A special committee of five were appointed to make the investigation. In the course of the investigation Hallet Kilbourn was called before the committee and refused to answer certain questions and to produce books; he was thereafter found in contempt of the House and ordered imprisoned until he expressed through the committee to the House a willingness to comply with the orders of the committee.

Later Kilbourn entered suit against the Sergeant at Arms of the House and certain Members of the House for false imprisonment. The case was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

KILBOURN v. THOMPSON.

[103 U. S., 168.]

This case presents clearly the question of the power of the House to punish for contempt. Justice Miller writes the opinion of the court and sustains the right of Kilbourn to recover of the Sergeant at Arms for false imprisonment. The argument of the court seems hostile to this power in the House, and restricts it within its narrowest limits.

After finding that there is no constitutional provision directly granting this power, the opinion continues:

The advocates of this power have, therefore, resorted to an implication of its existence, founded on two principal arguments. These are, first, its exercise by the House of Commons of England, from which country we, it is said, have derived our system of parliamentary law; and, second, the necessity of such a power to enable the two Houses of Congress to perform the duties and exercise the powers which the Constitution has conferred on them. (P. 182.)

We are of the opinion that the right of the House of Representatives to punish the citizen for a contempt of its authority or a breach of its privileges can derive no support from the precedents and practices of the two Houses of the English Parliament, nor from the adjudicated cases in which the English courts have upheld these practices. (P. 189.)

The House of Representatives has the sole right to impeach officers of the Government and the Senate to try them. Where the question of such impeachment is before either body acting in its appropriate sphere on that subject, we see no reason to doubt the right to compel the attendance of witnesses, and their answer to proper questions, in the same manner and by the use of the same means that courts of justice can in like cases. (P. 190.)

The court then concludes that the jurisdiction of investigating the assets and business of a bankrupt concern or a real estate pool is vested by the Constitution in the courts, and that Congress has no jurisdiction of the subject.

CASE OF ELVERTON R. CHAPMAN ET AL.

In the Senate in 1894 a special committee was appointed to investigate and report upon "any charge or charges which may be filed before it alleging that the action of any Senator has been corruptly or improperly influenced in the consideration of said bill—pending tariff bill—or that any attempt has been made to so influence legislation." The investigation grew out of newspaper charges, especially in connection with the sugar schedule of the tariff bill.

In the course of the investigation Chapman and others declined to answer questions propounded to them, and the cases were certified to the law courts for prosecutions. Chapman was indicted and convicted in the court and by writ of error appealed.

IN RE CHAPMAN, PETITIONER.

[166 U. S., 661.]

Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering the opinion of the court, considers the power of the Senate to punish for contempt. He holds:

Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; to determine the rules of its own proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection.

In Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168), among other important rulings, it was held that there existed no general power in Congress, or in either House, to make inquiry into the private affairs of a citizen; that neither House could, on the allegation that an insolvent debtor of the United States was interested in a private business partnership, investigate the affairs of that partnership as a mere matter of private concern; and that, consequently, there was no authority in either House to compel a witness to testify on the subject. The case at bar is wholly different. Specific charges publicly made against Senators had been brought to the attention of the Senate, and the Senate had determined that investigation was necessary. The subject matter as affecting the Senate was within the jurisdiction of the Senate. The questions were not intrusions into the affairs of the citizen; they did not seek to ascertain any facts as to the conduct, methods, extent, or details of the business of the firm in question, but only whether that firm, confessedly engaged in buying and selling stocks, and the particular stock named, was employed by any Senator to buy or sell for him any of that stock, whose market price might be affected by the Senate's action. We can not regard these questions as amounting to an unreasonable search into the private affairs of the witness simply because he may have been in some degree connected with the alleged transactions; and as investigations of this sort are within the power of either of the two Houses, they can not be defeated on purely sentimental grounds.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I desire to insert in the RECORD a statement I made before the special subcommittee appointed to investigate the alleged contempt of Mr. H. Snowden Marshall, on April 7, 1916:

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWIN Y. WEBB BEFORE THE SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there are a good many angles involved in this matter, but only one or two about which there might be any controversy at all.

As I understand it, the resolution has directed you gentlemen to investigate and report the facts, which happily are almost entirely of record, composed of the two letters which I set out in the report, written by Mr. Marshall to the chairman of the committee and to the chairman of the subcommittee. I therefore take it that it will be easy to report on that under the direction contained in the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you those letters?

Mr. WEBB. They are copied in the report. The other angle is to say whether or not the letters are in contempt of the House, and if so, what proceeding should be had, and the power of the House to punish for contempt.

On the question of whether or not the letters are contemptuous, I do not think there is any controversy as to that, when you take into consideration the surroundings at the time the letters were written. As you gentlemen know, Mr. BUCHANAN, on the 12th day of January, arose in his responsible place in the House and impeached Mr. H. Snowden Marshall for high crimes and misdemeanors and set out some 35 or 40 specific charges. Those charges, upon the motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, were referred to the Judiciary Committee for examination and report.

Shortly thereafter, having previously examined Mr. BUCHANAN and other witnesses, the Judiciary Committee directed the chairman to ask the House for power to subpœna witnesses, swear them, etc., and to make a further investigation of the charges in this resolution. In consequence thereof, H. Res. 110 was unanimously passed by the House, which gave the Judiciary Committee or any subcommittee thereof the power to further investigate the charges as set out in this resolution, and gave them power to subpœna witnesses and swear them and take testimony, either here in Washington or at any other place that the Judiciary Committee might deem proper to have the evidence taken—the regular power given committees in all impeachment matters, I may say.

The Judiciary Committee immediately thereafter authorized the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to appoint a subcommittee of three to take this testimony, which was done, I think, on or about the 1st of February. That committee consisted of Mr. CARLIN, Mr. GARD, and Mr. NELSON. Immediately thereafter they began their duties as directed by the House. They sat for a week or 10 days here in Washington and subpœnaed a number of witnesses. Judge Maher, United States judge from the southern district of New York, was one of the witnesses, and a number of other men of distinction were brought before the subcommittee and examined.

There were numerous witnesses whose names were furnished to the subcommittee who lived in New York, and the subcommittee thought, as a matter of economy and expedition, that it would be better to go to New York, nearer to the witnesses, in order to hasten the hearing. Consequently they determined to go to New York, and did go there on the 28th day of February, and opened their hearings in the Federal post-office building in New York City, and, after having sat for five or six days—Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday morning—investigating these charges made against Mr. Marshall, subpœnaing, of course, such witnesses as furnished them by the man accused, Mr. BUCHANAN.

Necessarily, I can say rather parenthetically here, all these investigations in impeachment charges are in the nature of inquisitorial proceedings; they must be in the nature of the case; it is an ex parte hearing, and may sometimes seem to the public generally to be a little harsh, but it is the only remedy the people have, the only method they have of getting rid of an unworthy officer, or of an officer who has been impeached by a Member of Congress in his responsible position.

These gentlemen had sat there all the week and the testimony is printed, and if you gentlemen want to go through it, it is at your disposal. On Monday morning there appeared in a newspaper in New York—in the New York Times—an article which, among other things, had this language in it:

"It is the belief in the district attorney's office that the real aim of the congressional investigation is to put a stop to the criminal investigation of the pro-German partisans."

Mr. STERLING. Is the substance of that article the same as this first letter that Marshall wrote to the committee? He states in that letter that what he claims to have stated to the newspaper man is an article along the same line of his letter.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; the general deductions and reference to securing the grand jury minutes for the subcommittee to see if any testimony was given before the grand jury. As you understand, one of the charges in the impeachment articles was that Mr. Marshall had corruptly procured from the grand jury in New York indictments against reputable citizens upon no testimony, without having any testimony, or sufficient testimony.

Mr. STERLING. Do Mr. BUCHANAN'S charges that he made on the floor of the House along that line refer to the Buchanan and Fowler cases particularly, or do they claim there were other cases?

Mr. WEBB. They claimed there were other cases.

Mr. STERLING. And they did not intend to cover the Buchanan and Fowler cases at all?

Mr. WEBB. They did intend to cover the Buchanan and Fowler cases.

Mr. STERLING. In the charges?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; Mr. BUCHANAN came before the committee and stated that was one of them, and he covered them generally because he said there were others. I believe some indictments grew out of what was known as the Rae Tanzer case, where other indictments were alleged to be found without any evidence, or without sufficient evidence.

That article appeared in the New York newspaper, and that article, a section of which I will read, of course appeared to the subcommittee to be unfair and unjust and untrue, and immediately they began to inquire who the author of the article was, and they discovered it was a young man by the name of Holme, I believe, and he, being in the committee room, they called him on the witness stand and asked him about this article, and they asked him who in the district attorney's office gave him the information. He declined to answer the question. They asked him if he got the information in the district attorney's office. He said, "Yes; that was the general report around the office." After a long series of questions, which are set out in the report, and he still declining to answer the question, the committee told him they would hold him in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms until further orders. At 4 o'clock and 10 minutes that afternoon they called him back on the stand and reasked him the same questions, and he still declined to answer them, declined to say whether Mr. Marshall was the author of this charge, or who it was, and thereupon the committee admonished him and told him they wanted to be kind to him and not harsh and would turn him loose, discharge him until some further steps might be taken under the laws of the United States. You gentlemen know that the law provides that where a witness refuses to answer a question before a congressional investigating committee, he is guilty of a crime and can be indicted by being reported to the district attorney's office in the District of Columbia by the Speaker of the House or by the Vice President of the Senate.

This occurred on Friday afternoon. On Saturday morning this subcommittee continued its investigation by examining some other witnesses. Saturday afternoon, about 6 o'clock, I am informed, the first letter of date March 4 was written to Mr. CARLIN.

Mr. CARLIN. About 3 o'clock.

Mr. WARD. And I am informed by Mr. CARLIN that he knew nothing about the letter until the newspapers in New York called him up to know about it. In other words, the letter had been given to the public press in New York before it was even received by the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee.

The letter speaks for itself, gentlemen. In my opinion, it is unjust, it is slanderous, it is contemptuous.

Mr. MOON. You are speaking of the letter of March 4?

Mr. WEBB. The letter of March 4 that Mr. Marshall wrote the subcommittee.

Mr. MOON. That you presented to the House?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. The letter is undoubtedly contemptuous, and was written and published for the purpose of expressing the contempt of the writer. Every line of it is contemptuous in the most unfair kind of language, and the fact that Mr. Marshall, at the conclusion of the letter, says, "I propose to make this letter public," and before ever letting the chairman of the committee look over it and see it, it was put in the hands of the newspapers and published all over New York for the purpose of bringing disgrace and contumely and shame on a committee sent to New York by the House of Representatives in the pursuance of one of its constitutional functions, to wit, the most powerful constitutional function probably the Congress has—that is, the power of impeachment. The Constitution says distinctly it is one of the few distinct things provided in the Constitution—that is, that the House shall be the sole originators of impeachment cases.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask you there—we are directed here to find whether a contempt has been committed. I should like to know your views as to whether or not in making that finding we are required to pass upon what, if any, basis of truth there may be in the charges made in this letter?

Mr. WEBB. Answering you, Mr. LENROOT, it makes no difference to the committee——

Mr. LENROOT (interposing). I merely wished to get your view as to the law.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think it is necessary to find a basis for it, but I should like you to read over the testimony and find there is no basis for it, if you will.

Mr. GARNER. Was that testimony taken in New York by the subcommittee?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and we shall be glad to furnish this committee with a copy of the evidence. I have read every line of it, and I want to say that I have been in these inquisitions before, and I have realized myself in questioning witnesses that we have gone a little far. We have not been compelled—there is no law which compels an investigating committee of this sort to observe the rules laid down——

Mr. GARNER (interposing). May I ask a question in connection with the one Mr. LENROOT propounded a moment ago?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I hope you gentlemen will ask questions.

Mr. GARNER. Let us suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the statements made in the letter by Mr. Marshall are true; that the subcommittee had done all the things that he intimated they did in his letter. Being an officer of the Government and holding a high position, would he be justified in writing that kind of a letter, admitting the facts stated therein to be true?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think he would, Mr. GARNER, even if everything he said was true, because the manner in which he writes it, the manner in which he made it public, the contemptuous expressions all through show that, even though what he states is true, he purposely and deliberately planned to make his letter full of contempt for the purpose of reflecting upon these gentlemen, bringing disgrace upon them, and if possible, driving them out of New York.

Mr. MOON. Will you file with the committee, to be printed with this report, the testimony to which you refer?

Mr. WEBB. I will, Mr. MOON; yes, sir.

Mr. Marshall starts out by saying:

"You are exploiting charges against me of oppressive conduct toward a Member of your honorable body who is charged with a violation of law, and of oppressive conduct on my part toward shysters in the blackmailing and bankruptcy business."

Then he takes up this man Holme's trouble. He is the man who becomes offended because Holme was required or asked to tell if he got his information from the district attorney, and the district attorney behind Holme, it seems, was trying to reflect upon the subcommittee, and when the subcommittee questioned him to find out where he was getting his evidence and the newspaper reporter declined to answer, then Mr. Marshall runs to his rescue with this contemptuous letter. He said:

"I may be able to lighten your labors by offering to resign if you can indicate anything I ever did that remotely approximates the lawless tyranny of your order of arrest of Mr. Holme."

"Lawless tyranny"; there is a man who had published in the newspaper, issued right over the office where these three gentlemen representing the dignity of the House of Representatives were sitting, a charge of slander against them. It was slander.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask you right there, is it your view of the law that this subcommittee did have a right to arrest Mr. Holme?

Mr. WEBB. It had the right to detain him in custody, for the present at least.

Mr. LENROOT. I just wanted to know your view about that.

Mr. STERLING. On that point, Mr. Webb, of course, I have not any doubt but what a committee has the right to detain him in custody; then, I suppose, they should report it to the House, and the House would determine the question as to whether or not the detention should be continued.

Mr. WEBB. I think you are right there, sir.

Mr. STERLING. But at the time Holme refused to answer these questions you were not investigating the charges which Buchanan had made in the House?

Mr. WEBB. That is true, sir.

Mr. STERLING. You think you did have a right to ask that question and compel witnesses to answer, it being a collateral matter and not of the substance of the investigation?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to you, Judge Sterling, that question has never been decided in the history of this Government. The question never arose before (that particular collateral question), because no committee of the House of Representatives investigating impeachment charges under the highest constitutional prerogative, so far as I know, has ever been assaulted in a manner like this, or ever had occasion to call a man up before them and try to determine from whom he got the insulting information, and especially when the paper stated that it came from the very man whom the subcommittee was investigating.

Mr. LENROOT. Has it been decided that the subcommittee of the House has a right to detain a witness in custody?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir: not that I know of.

Mr. CRISP. In the Kilbourn case, did not the Supreme Court hold that either branch of Congress could deal with a contumacious witness, provided they were authorized to legislate or deal with the matter on which he declined to answer?

Mr. WEBB. That was the point on which the Kilbourn case was decided by Justice Miller. They held, and held only, that in that particular case the House of Representatives had no authority to appoint a committee to investigate the private matters of a concern, to wit, whether a man held stock in what is known as a real estate pool in the District of Columbia, and consequently his refusal to answer a question and produce books, he was thereafter found in contempt of the House, and incarcerated by the Sergeant at Arms, was unlawful, the whole business void, and therefore the Sergeant at Arms liable, but in that very case they do not say that the House of Representatives has not the inherent power to punish for contempt, and especially, as Judge Miller sets out, that whereas his argument may throw some doubt upon the general power of the House to punish for contempt with ordinary representative committees, yet there are certain questions which it, under the Constitution, specifically is given power to investigate, to wit, election contests. It can punish a Member for improper conduct, and can originate and try impeachment cases.

Mr. STERLING. There are several cases where punishment by the House has been sustained?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; I will cite them.

Mr. STERLING. As to contumacious witnesses, I think in the Kilbourn case, if I remember, the court discharged him because the House was trying to investigate a matter over which they did not have jurisdiction?

Mr. WEBB. That is right.

Mr. STERLING. The question arose in my mind as to whether or not this committee, when it had Holme in its investigation, that the article then appeared in the paper after the committee had been appointed was not covered by the committee's commission to investigate.

Mr. WEBB That is true. That is why I say it is a novel point.

Mr. CRISP. That is why I called attention to the Kilbourn case.

Mr. GARNER. Judge Sterling, admitting the fact that the subcommittee did not have the right to investigate Mr. Holme or commit him, as it were, would that justify the district attorney in writing the character of letter that he did to the subcommittee?

Mr. STERLING. I will tell you how I feel about that personally. Of course a man may commit a libel by telling the truth, so far as that is concerned, but there is not any use to present a matter to this House; there is no contempt where the libel is the truth. The House would not stand that for a minute.

Mr. WEBB. No; I would not have you do that.

Mr. STERLING. The House would not stand for it, and I think we ought to proceed so we are sure of our ground.

Mr. WEBB. But, gentlemen, leaving out the Holme matter entirely, except as a starting point for Mr. Marshall; leaving out the question of whether or not they had the right to hold him in custody—and by the way, I want to say that the subcommittee never ordered him into the custody of the United States marshal at all; it ordered him to be held by Mr. Gordon, the Sergeant at Arms of the House for a few hours, and later called him on the stand, and then dismissed him. He was in the custody of Mr. Gordon, and they walked around the building together; stayed together, very pleasantly associated together.

He goes on, though, and practically takes up the burden of making this charge against the House of Representatives that this man Holme made in the paper. Now, I will leave out Holme entirely.

He says:

"I may be able to lighten your labors by offering to resign if you can indicate anything I ever did that remotely approximates the lawless tyranny of your order of arrest of Mr. Holme.

"The supposed justification of your order that Mr. Holme be placed in custody was his refusal to answer the question you asked as to where he got the information on which was based the article which displeased you."

Now, mark you, that article was in the New York Times saying that this whole congressional investigation—saying that it was the belief of the district attorney's office that the real aim of the congressional investigation was to put a stop to the criminal investigation of the pro-German partisans.

That was not a reflection upon that subcommittee; and if it were, it would be a reflection upon the House of Representatives, because, constructively, when the House of Representatives appointed this committee, the power of the House and the dignity of the House itself went to New York. Manifestly, the House can not sit and hear three or four weeks of testimony in investigating preliminary impeachment charges, and therefore they assign that power to some responsible subcommittee; and when this committee went to New York it had thrown around it the power and protection of the House of Representatives, as lodged in the House of Representatives by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MOON. The resolution of the House authorizes the Judiciary Committee to appoint this subcommittee.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; that is set out in H. Res. 110, embodied in the report, Mr. Chairman.

There was a direct and awful reflection upon the House of Representatives, and a reflection which is not true, which every man in the House and on the floor of the House knows is not true. It was made for the purpose of bringing disgrace upon that body, upon the House of Representatives, and upon the subcommittee that dared investigate the charges presented by a Member of the House.

Now, Mr. Marshall says, further:

"It is not necessary for you to place anyone under arrest in order to get the answers to the question which you asked Mr. Holme, because I can and will answer it. I gave Mr. Holme information, part of which he published and from which he made deductions, so that if your honorable committee has a grievance it is against me and not against him."

That is the man whose conduct the Congress of the United States has solemnly instructed its subcommittee to investigate.

"What I told him was about as follows:

"I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith."

That was contemptuous.

"Your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith"—

That was a direct charge of bad faith on the part of Congress and of the subcommittee—

"but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body."

One of the body of the House of Representatives.

Gentlemen, that language alone was as contemptuous as a man could possibly write, and especially under the circumstances, and with the determination and announced statement in his letter that he proposed to make such contemptuous language public, and says this:

"I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, had come here and had held public hearings"—

So far as I know, in every investigation for the last 10 or 12 years all hearings have been held publicly. In the beginning of this investigation had in the Judiciary Committee room, the first witnesses were examined in secret session, and I may say to you gentlemen here it was done because we thought there were some witnesses whose testimony might not be worthy of credence which the committee ought to give an honorable witness, and that testimony was held behind closed doors, and for the sake of H. Snowden Marshall was never made public and never has been made public. There was the subcommittee and the Judiciary Committee and the House trying to protect him against witnesses that the committee itself did not have entire confidence in, and he rushes into open print and slanders the committee that has theretofore been trying to protect him. I say that all these investigations heretofore have been held in public, so in the Swayne case in Florida, so in the Archbald case, so in the Hanford case, so in the Dayton case.

Mr. STERLING. Did we not have any secret hearings in the Archbald case at all?

Mr. WEBB. I do not believe we did.

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe we did after we began taking testimony.

Mr. WEBB. We had an executive session around the table and read documentary evidence, but all of the hearings were public.

Mr. LENROOT. The subcommittee held hearings outside of Washington in the Swayne case?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and in other cases.

Mr. GARNER. You say these hearings behind closed doors were for the protection of Mr. Marshall?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely

Mr. GARNER. Upon the idea that witnesses might make statements concerning his official conduct that would reflect upon him unjustly?

Mr. WEBB. I think I can say that absolutely for the subcommittee. They were aware that among these 50 or 60 witnesses whose names had been given them, we got the idea that a few of them were not entirely responsible, or that their characters might be impeached, whose character had been impeached by members of the Judiciary Committee sitting around the executive board, and for the purpose of not paralyzing the arm of the district attorney's office in New York by testimony which might be regarded as tainted with improper character, some of these witnesses were examined behind closed doors.

May I say that for the subcommittee? If I am in error, I want to be corrected.

(Messrs. NELSON and GARD signified their assent.)

He charges the subcommittee of the House of Representatives with bad faith, and then goes on to say:

"I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, had come here and had held public hearings; that among your witnesses you had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistants under the full privilege of testifying before a congressional committee."

Having read the testimony, every word of it, as taken by the official stenographer in New York, I deny that charge against the subcommittee. It is not true. It is not true that these gentlemen invited anybody. Mr. BUCHANAN, on the floor of the House, stated to the House that he was a poor man and could make these charges against Mr. Marshall good if he had the power to get witnesses present, and it has been the custom during all the years of you gentlemen's long and honorable career that whenever a Member of Congress impeaches any civil officer of the United States that he furnishes the names of the witnesses and the House subpœnas them. This subcommittee simply went up there in obedience to the desire of the House to investigate the charges set out by this man BUCHANAN and for him to furnish the witnesses to be examined. I believe I have stated that this subcommittee of its own initiative has not subpœnaed any witness?

Mr. NELSON. Do you wish an answer?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. We have not; no witness not suggested by Mr. BUCHANAN or who requested to be heard; for instance, Mr. Wise.

Mr. WEBB. I think that should be known to the gentlemen of this special committee. They did not go around hunting up testimony, as they had a right to. If they had wanted to, they could have put men to work and hunted up testimony against this man Marshall. But no; they had contented themselves to subpœna and examine witnesses submitted to them by Congressman BUCHANAN—excepting in one case there was testimony before the subcommittee in New York about a certain matter, and Hon. Henry A. Wise——

Mr. NELSON. Let me qualify that in this much, that when some evidence was given on some certain charge, where the witness mentioned some particular name, and the chairman wished to corroborate that, he would send for that person mentioned in the testimony.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; that is all right. This committee was sitting there and taking testimony and Mr. Henry A. Wise, the predecessor of Mr. H. Snowden Marshall, a very distinguished lawyer in New York City, as you all know, volunteered to take the stand in behalf of Mr. Marshall, you might say. If you read his testimony you will find it is a most magnificent encomium on Mr. Marshall and Mr. Marshall's administration up there, explaining the use of the grand jury and the ease with which indictments might be found, etc., and the committee heard him voluntarily on behalf of Mr. Marshall. He says:

"You invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard me."

The subcommittee has informed me that they do not know of a single man that was examined by this subcommittee who has ever been convicted of roguery or of larceny.

I will tell you what they did do, gentlemen. In the Rae Tanzer case, and in that case without discussing the merit of it, I might say that Hon. Martin Littleton, at one time a very distinguished Member of this House, known as a great lawyer, stated before the subcommittee here in Washington about 10 days ago that when Mr. Marshall took jurisdiction of the Rae Tanzer case he wrenched the Federal jurisdiction. Mr. Whitney, a witness, Judge Mayer, Hon. J. B. Stanchfield were witnesses—some of the highest class men in the United States—and many of them testified gladly to the good character and the high standing of Hon. H. Snowden Marshall.

Mr. STERLING. Were any of the witnesses persons whom Marshall had prosecuted?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; necessarily so. There was a man by the name of Kugel, I believe, a lawyer.

Mr. GARD. Several of them were.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GARD. That was the Oppenheimer case.

Mr. WEBB. It was stated that after indictments had been quashed that the district attorney would go up to the grand jury and get another indictment; sometimes got six or seven, but they had to be investigated. It was charged that he showed that malicious and persistent feeling toward these men not consistent with a good officer. They did have to examine him, of course. But the subcommittee knew he had been indicted and what he was indicted for, and the members of the subcommittee were big enough and broad enough to take into consideration the circumstances and were able to weigh the testimony.

I was going to tell you what was done in the Rae Tanzer case. A man by the name of Safford, who was indicted for perjury——

Mr. STERLING. What is that case you were speaking of?

Mr. WEBB. I think I will explain it briefly. There was a little woman by the name of Rae Tanzer who was taken to a town in New Jersey and there she was——

Mr. STERLING (interposing). Under the Mann Act?

Mr. WEBB. Not under the Mann Act; but a gentleman, who said his name was Oliver Osborn, spent a night with her and abused her. Later on she wrote letters, and she finally got no word from him, and she located James W. Osborn and charged him with being Oliver Osborn, and she went then to consult four or five law firms, and could not get anybody to represent her, and finally got Slade & Slade to represent her, and Slade & Slade brought a civil suit in the civil court of New York for breach of promise, seduction, etc.; and while that civil suit was pending in the United States court, under Mr. Marshall's jurisdiction and with Mr. Marshall's consent and helping to arrange it, Hon. James W. Osborn, being then in the employ, I believe, of the United States Government in prosecuting the New Haven Railroad cases, they issued a warrant for the Slades and for Rae Tanzer and for Rae Tanzer's two sisters and some other witnesses, I believe.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Safford?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Safford, who was clerk of the hotel, who identified James W. Osborn as being the man who spent the night there.

Mr. NELSON. And the private detective?

Mr. WEBB. Yes They indicted Slade for conspiracy to obstruct justice in a United States court.

Mr. GARD. It is fair to say that the matter arose in this way: Rae Tanzer, the complaining person in the civil case, was arraigned before Commissioner Houghton, United States commissioner, on the specific charge that she had written a letter to James W. Osborn, which they charged was an abuse of the mails and an attempt to use the mails for the purpose of obtaining money under blackmail and unlawfully defraud. The letter hardly bears such an interpretation, but that was the start of the prosecution.

Mr. WEBB. That was the hook upon which they hung the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. GARD. Yes; that was what they hung the jurisdiction of the United States court on. Then all other indictments were returned for conspiracy and perjury and things like that; they put everything in, and everybody in, the lawyers and her sisters, and everybody else; they indicted them for conspiracy and some for perjury, but that was the original jurisdiction, the writing of the letter.

Mr. WEBB. And during all these indictments, cross indictments, and conspiracy charges lying up there in New York from the United States district attorney's office they indicted the man by the name of Safford for perjury, and they convicted him.

Now, that man Safford was subpœnaed here as a witness. His name was given to the committee by Mr. Buchanan, and although he had been indicted, there was no reason why he should not testify. But he came down and the committee would not hear him; they said, "We will not swear you; you have been convicted of perjury; you can send a statement or an affidavit down here if you want to." That is how that subcommittee was protecting Mr. H. Snowden Marshall.

Mr. GARD. That was even after this letter was received.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. On that point let me tell you also for the record that another gentleman came to the committee and asked to be heard, and said he had a very severe case of oppression on the part of Mr. Marshall. He was asked if he had been convicted. He admitted he had, and the chairman informed him that we could not hear him; that he might file his statement in the form of an affidavit, and that was done.

Mr. WEBB. So I say his charge against this House and this subcommittee that "they have invited every rogue they could lay their hands on to come before the subcommittee and blackguard and slander me (Marshall)," I say is untrue.

A little further on he says:

"I told him that you were traveling around"—

That is another contemptuous remark—

"I told him that you (the subcommittee) were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with BUCHANAN'S counsel, Walsh and David Slade, in constant conference with you. I said that I believed that every word of the evidence, whether in so-called secret sessions or not, had been placed at the disposal of these worthies, and that I would be just as willing to give the grand jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee."

Mr. MOON. How was that; he would as soon give——

Mr. WEBB. He would "as soon give the grand jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee."

Mr. MOON. These rogues?

Mr. WEBB. No; BUCHANAN and those others indicted with him.

Mr. STERLING. He means by that that he thought the committee would turn them over, anyhow, to BUCHANAN'S lawyers?

Mr. MOON. Oh, yes; it is to BUCHANAN'S lawyers instead of these other parties he is speaking of?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. To what extent were Walsh and Slade present?

Mr. WEBB. They were present most of the time when they wanted to be; but I will say, gentlemen, there is nothing unusual about that, so far as I know. Mr. Marshall could have been present himself. In investigating the Dayton charges, there were two lawyers pressing the charges against Judge Dayton.

Mr. STERLING. Did they take part in examining witnesses?

Mr. WEBB. They did. They started out with this method—it was cumbersome, as you will see—by requiring Mr. BUCHANAN or Mr. BUCHANAN'S counsel to write out each question they wanted to ask the witness. You can see that would have drawn out the examination for six or eight months; so finally the members of the committee said, "Just go ahead and ask a few direct questions yourselves. We sit here; we understand the situation," and that was done in this case.

I should like you gentlemen to read the testimony and see that there were no improper questions asked by this subcommittee of these witnesses in New York, and they do not seem to me to have allowed anybody to ask improper questions.

Mr LENROOT. I notice in the paragraph preceding that which you have just read the charges that this subcommittee attempted to secure the minutes of the grand jury.

Mr. WEBB. I can make a statement now on that question. I was just taking up what I thought to be contemptuous language. The truth is that one of the compelling reasons why they went to New York was that these charges having been made and sent out over the country, these charges not only against BUCHANAN but charges that other indictments had been procured by Mr. Marshall before the grand jury without sufficient evidence, or without any evidence, and these gentlemen thought they would go up there and take a private look at these grand jury minutes and come back, never dreaming of allowing Mr. BUCHANAN or his counsel to ever put an eye on those minutes; and when they got there they asked Mr. Marshall if he had objections to submitting the grand jury minutes. Mr. Marshall replied that he would have to consult the Attorney General; and he did telegraph to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General wired back that he did not think the committee ought to ask or demand the minutes of the grand jury.

I can say there are ways in which you can get the minutes of the grand jury in other trials; and I am not so sure, gentlemen, I have advised all through this hearing the members of the subcommittee not to make the grand jury minutes public, not to insist on their production, and not to allow any testimony to be presented in this hearing that was presented before the grand jury, but to confine their hearing, which they did, to the question as to whether or not any testimony was taken upon which the grand jury might act. Not the sufficiency of it, but was the testimony had; and that was the line on which these gentlemen pursued this entire investigation up there. When Mr. Marshall presented the telegram to the members of the subcommittee, that was the end of the grand jury minutes. They never issued subpœna duces tecum to get the minutes at all; but I think if any court in the land has the power to compel the production of the minutes of the grand jury in a case, this court has got that power. It is the highest court in the world. But they did not exercise that power They never issued a subpœna duces tecum, and when Mr. Marshall presented this telegram from the Attorney General, that was the end of it.

Mr. NELSON. We never made it public. We had a little private talk with him, but he gave it publicity.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; this newspaper article is headed: "The district attorney refuses BUCHANAN evidence." That is the heading of this article I have been quoting from. He went out and gave it to the newspapers, but the rest of it the subcommittee never made public; any part of it.

He said:

"I told him you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with BUCHANAN'S counsel, Walsh."

I believe I have read that. I will now read one more extract from this letter:

"I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant; how you had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered.

"I told him that I would not permit the prosecution of the persons whose cause you had apparently espoused to be impeded by you: I said that if you wanted the minutes of the grand jury in any case you would not get them as long as I remained in office."

Now, I will read the last paragraph:

"It is amazing to me to think that you supposed that I did not understand what you have been attempting to do during your visit here. I realized that your effort was to ruin me and my office by publishing with your full approval the complaints of various persons who have run afoul of the criminal law under my administration. Your subcommittee has endeavored by insulting questions to my assistants and others, by giving publicity and countenance to the charges of rascals, and by refusing to listen to the truth and refusing to examine public records to which your attention was directed to publicly disgrace me and my office"—

And so forth. "I propose to make this letter public," and does so, and does it before it gets to the hands, so I am informed, of the subcommittee itself.

Mr. STERLING. Did the subcommittee ask Mr. Marshall for the grand jury minutes in any other cases than the Buchanan case?

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. All the cases covered by the charge.

Mr. NELSON. This was the conversation, if you wish it. The difficulty was to ascertain the truth about these things, and knowing that it was the practice in New York to have a stenographer in the grand jury room, and that this public official had those grand jury minutes, we thought that, being a representative of the highest court in the land on this matter, we had a right to inspect those grand jury minutes; at least we would submit the request to him. So he was asked to come before the committee, and I may say that, while these things are little incidents, they show the hostility, the atmosphere charged with hostility in that courthouse, so far as this district attorney's office was concerned. It was difficult for the Sergeant at Arms of the House to get to him. He will testify here that he had to plead with one of his subordinates in order to get to him. He will tell you the conversation. Finally he did come up, and then the Sergeant at Arms finally persuaded him to come up and see the committee.

Mr. Marshall came up. I will not attempt to picture to you the kind of air he assumed and the arrogance. Mr. CARLIN tried to introduce him, having met him before, to some of the members of the committee, but his hostility was such that any courtesies were impossible; so Mr. CARLIN, the chairman of the subcommittee, tried to explain to him that we were a congressional committee trying to ascertain these facts; that a Member had been accused, and that it was difficult to ascertain these facts without seeing the grand jury minutes.

We asked him if the grand jury minutes were printed. He said they were. Mr. CARLIN asked him if he would submit them to the members. In a haughty way he said that he would take it up with the Attorney General. He pretended not even to have read the charges. I tendered him the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He said, "Send it down." He would not take it down.

Mr. WEBB. You mean the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. NELSON. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where the charges were in detail.

Well, that was the interview in which we also suggested to him that he had the perfect right to be present, either by counsel or himself. He told us he would not want anything to do with it, and he left, as he came, with that superb, arrogant manner of his. Well, it was so ludicrous that we were, of course, inclined to laugh at the gentleman's arrogance.

Mr. STERLING. Did you ask him the question as to whether there was any testimony before the grand jury?

Mr. NELSON. This man——

Mr. STERLING (interposing). Mr. BUCHANAN'S charge is that indictments were found where there was no evidence.

Mr. WEBB. No evidence in one case and not sufficient in another.

Mr. STERLING. Did you ask him whether or not there was any evidence?

Mr. NELSON. We did not ask him, because he was the gentleman against whom charges were preferred, and it is not customary, you know, to ask the respondent or the defendant in the case. It was not done in the Wright hearings. We never did that. That is a matter for him to volunteer, if he wishes to.

Mr. WEBB. I understand, Judge Nelson, that thereafter he came before you informally.

Mr. GARD. This conversation was entirely executive; did not go into the record; was not uttered in the present of a stenographer, and we said this to him. The chairman said to him—after the committee had conferred about it, the chairman said to him this: "Have you read the charges preferred against you?" He said no, he had not read them; had not paid any attention to them. We said, "Some of the charges are that you have used your office to return indictments against persons without any testimony. We should like to have a talk with you as to whether you would be willing to submit to the committee such minutes of the grand jury as may be called for, or whether you would prefer us, if we choose, to call for the minutes, to ask for them upon the authority of our committee." That was the extent of our conversation. He said "Well, I will take that up with the Attorney General," which I think was very proper. Then he became, as Mr. Nelson said—his manner was hostile at that time, had been hostile all the time. He said, "If you want to know anything, why do you not ask BUCHANAN what he did with this money that he got from such and such a place." I have forgotten the source. We did not make any reply to that, because that was not for us to investigate.

Mr. NELSON. We did ask—the chairman did ask for both minutes; suggested that not only the minutes in this indictment of BUCHANAN, but also these in the Rae Tanzer case, would be desirable, and explained that it would so materially assist our labors if we could say there was some evidence. He also said that we were representatives of the Government; that we assured him it would be private, strictly private, and that no one else would be permitted to see them; and with that conversation we left it to him to seek information from the Attorney General, and he promised to reply promptly. Now, mind you, there was a sting of insult in the very reply we got. These are minor matters, but they simply show the hostile attitude of that office all the way through.

Mr. CARLIN, the chairman, had tried to explain to him that the House seemed to be particularly concerned with ascertaining the fact whether a Member of the House, in his official capacity, had been indicted for things done in the House, and that we should like to ascertain whether they were true or not; whether there was some evidence. Mind you, when he replied—and I do not believe it is in here—but after tendering him the record he sent it back with a letter saying that he returned it with thanks, etc. Then he said he had looked these charges through and he had not found anything there along the lines suggested by Mr. CARLIN, therefore it must have been evolved in the consciousness of some person or persons, the implication being direct that some one had told him something that was not true. That is just suggestive of the treatment we received all the way through.

Mr. LENROOT. At what point in this proceeding was the request for the minutes of the grand jury preferred?

Mr. NELSON. In the afternoon of the first day.

Mr. LENROOT. Of the meeting in New York?

Mr. NELSON. In New York; yes, sir.

Mr. GARD. Right after we organized.

Mr. NELSON. We had one or two witnesses, then decided that this was a laborous thing to fish around the outside and try to find out whether there was evidence or not; that here was a public document. We knew they used these grand jury minutes in the State of New York frequently, and for purposes of justice it was always admissible to bring them out. We were accredited officers of the law; this was the high court of impeachment; obviously this officer could give us access to such documents by which we could at once discharge our duty and say to the House, "Yes; there is evidence."

Mr. LENROOT. You say there were two charges in relation to this evidence—one that there was no evidence and the other that there was not sufficient evidence. I want to ask whether your subcommittee decided that it was proper to investigate the question of the sufficiency of the evidence and desired it for that purpose?

Mr. NELSON. No; I did not mean to imply that.

Mr. LENROOT. Did you decide that it was not?

Mr. NELSON. We did not decide, certainly——

Mr. LENROOT (interposing). So far as this inquiry in New York was concerned, I mean

Mr. NELSON. We went along on the plan that we would ascertain whether or not there was probable, prima facie evidence and determine whether this man had acted arbitrarily or not, or whether he had supplied evidence of such a character that it would be prima facie in an indictment of a Member of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Did you then have in mind determining whether or not the grand jury was warranted if the evidence was sufficient to warrant the grand jury in making the indictment, or whether there was any evidence?

Mr. NELSON. No; we did not attempt to weigh the evidence in the sense of determining it was sufficient. We never had that in mind; at least it never occurred to my mind, but merely to determine this, whether this man had acted arbitrarily, whether there was evidence of such a character to show that he had it in good faith, and not simply retaliated against a Member of Congress for what he did in the House.

Mr. WEBB. On that point I want to state to the committee——

Mr. NELSON (interposing). You will find in the evidence, if you will read it that that was in my mind. The thing I was concerned about, gentlemen, was whether a Member of Congress had been questioned in this way for things done in the House. Though I thought, when we had the grand jurors before us, not to ask as to the evidence, but to find out whether they knew of this indictment, whether that was talked of in the grand jury—I mean this impeachment of Mr. Marshall; whether that was talked about in the grand jury; what the methods were, whether they had given them a fair chance or not; whether he had simply been indicted with a mass of fellows and in what way they had handled the matter. We did not go into the evidence. We would not permit any questions that would tend directly to ask what the evidence was. It was a very difficult matter to handle, so we thought if we could get the grand jury admitted we could ascertain in a moment, but being denied we did nothing further in the matter.

Mr. GARD. As far as my own opinion is concerned, I am very frank to say to you that I think the subcommittee was entirely without authority to weigh the evidence or consider what the evidence should be; that it was limited, necessarily, to whether there was any evidence or any approximate evidence which would authorize an indictment. In other words, a distinction between returning an indictment upon evidence and an indictment by coercion, without evidence.

Mr. WEBB. On that point I wish to say that on the 14th day of December Mr. BUCHANAN arose in the House and impeached Mr. Marshall, charging five or six different charges. On the 28th day of December, 14 days later, the indictment against Mr. BUCHANAN was found; then on the 12th day of January Mr. BUCHANAN offered another set of formal articles of impeachment.

Mr. GARD. Amended charges?

Mr. WEBB. Amended charges; and I think he intimated on the floor of the House—it was certainly discussed around the table—that this indictment of the 28th, of Mr. BUCHANAN, was or might have been—looked like it was in retaliation of BUCHANAN'S impeaching measure on the 14th day of December, and that is why these gentlemen wanted to satisfy the House that there was no such fact in the district attorney's conduct, or that it was a fact. That is why, I imagine, they were asking these questions.

Now, gentlemen, I do not believe, as far as I am concerned, that I have a particle of feeling against Mr. Marshall, and you gentlemen have not, and no member of the committee has. I started out in this whole matter with the very highest regard for him. I had heard and knew from what a good many said that he was a man of high character, a great lawyer, and stood splendidly at the bar in New York. In fact, it was a pleasure to many of us to hear great lawyers give him that kind of reputation.

I am talking around the board now, but the members of the Judiciary Committee, and I might say a majority of members, probably an overwhelming majority of members, feel the same way toward Mr. Marshall; and I am going to say further that I thought from the very beginning that it was very improbable they would ever fix anything on Mr. Marshall to cause the committee of the House to impeach him. That was the attitude, I can say, of the chairman, and I believe that was in the breasts of all the members of the committee when they started out to investigate these charges by direction of the House.

Gentlemen, as to whether or not this is a contempt is entirely within your breasts. I know of no other court, a little police court down here, or even a magistrate's court, or any other inferior court, while hearing the testimony in regard to the defendant, if such judge should receive such a letter with the notification to the judge who got it that the writer expected to make it public for the purpose of disgracing the judge that was investigating him, I know what would happen to him. They would put him in jail and put him there for a good long term.

Mr. GARNER. In order to make the record perfectly clear, in view of Mr. Marshall's statement that, "I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith," I should like to ask the subcommittee whether the investigation was being made in good faith or not?

Mr. WEBB. Entirely so.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER And again he says:

"I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant."

Were you gentlemen rushing to the assistance of an indicted defendant?

Mr. GARD. We were not. We had no idea of doing anything except seeking to obtain information.

Mr. NELSON. In answer to your question, I want to call attention to the fact that the Committee on the Judiciary resisted the resolution of the House to forthwith instruct the committee to begin the investigation. The chairman made a plea, and I did myself, asking you first to submit the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, so we might make a preliminary investigation in regard to the facts, and it was only because we had the overpowering sentiment of the House and Mr. BUCHANAN'S added facts and specific charges—he made 40, instead of a few—that led the committee to look into this matter. And, if I may add, I personally requested the chairman not to be appointed on that committee, because I had once served on an impeachment committee for three months, and I knew it was a very laborious and irksome task.

Mr. GARNER. He says:

"You had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered."

Had you gentlemen resolved upon any proceedings?

Mr. NELSON. Of course not.

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. GARNER. I merely asked that, that it may go into the record directly.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we understand.

Mr. CRISP. Is that necessary? Will not the record show; will not the resolution show that these gentlemen were acting in pursuance of the direction of the House to make this investigation?

Mr. WEBB. Permit me to go a point further. I want to give you some citations on the law, if you will permit me. Whenever you gentlemen are wearied I will quit. I have taken more time than I intended to take, but that has come about through questions propounded by the members of the committee, and I am glad you asked questions; that is the best way to elicit information. I hope you will keep it up as long as I am talking.

As I said, it is entirely for this committee and the House to pass upon what is contempt, and here is what the Supreme Court says in the case of Anderson against Dunn. You will find the report in Sixth Wheaton, written by Mr. Justice Johnson, one of the justices of that court, a great justice, and Judge Marshall. Here is what they say about the contempt of the House:

"Nor would their situation be materially relieved by resorting to their legislative power within that district. That power may, indeed, be applied to many purposes, and was intended by the Constitution to extend to many purposes indispensable to the security and dignity of the General Government, but they are purposes of a more grave and general character than the offenses which may be denominated contempts and which, from their very nature, admit of no precise definition. Judicial gravity will not admit of the illustrations which this remark would admit of. Its correctness is easily tested by pursuing, in imagination, a legislative attempt at defining the cases to which the epithet contempt might be reasonably applied."

As I said a while ago, the Constitution, in Article I, section 2, paragraph 5, says:

"And the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment."

There have been, from the year 1800, witnesses and slanderers of the House and the Senate punished for contempt by your body, up to the time Mr. Glover was punished for an assault upon Judge SIMS; but every one of these cases arose out of the general power of the House and the Senate, as set out in Anderson v. Dunn, to punish for contempts against the body. There never has been in the history of this Government a plain, straightforward case of contempt under an indisputable power of Congress, and that is the sole power of impeachment. There the Constitution makes Congress the highest court in the world, as it says in one case it is the grand inquest of the Nation.

Gentlemen, I want to submit to you this: If whenever the House of Representatives in pursuing its constitutional prerogatives, investigating officials of the country, who may be bad or good; if you have not the power, not only to send your subcommittees and committees to investigate charges made by a Member of the House, and protect that committee wherever it goes with all the dignity and authority that any committee or court ought to have, why, then, the power of impeachment is nothing but a farce in the hands of the House of Representatives.

Mr. STERLING. I have no doubt but what a contempt committed against a committee would be a contempt committed against the House.

Mr. WEBB. That is the point I am arguing, Judge STERLING. As I said a while ago, when this committee went to New York it went there as the House of Representatives.

Mr. STERLING. It was the House, acting as such; it was its authorized agent.

Mr. CRISP. I do not suppose there is any difference of opinion in the minds of the committee as to the inherent right of the House to punish for contempt.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. WEBB. If there is any doubt about it, I want to refer you to this celebrated case where the court distinctly says, as Judge Crisp has suggested, that it has the inherent power that every representative body has, the right of self-protection and the right to repel and punish insult to the dignity of that body. But that case even arose not in such a clear case as the impeachment process; it arose because a witness had refused to answer a question, or had made some slanderous charge against the House of Congress or the Members, or had attempted to bribe a Member, or had published the Journal of the Senate, contrary to the rules of the Senate, or had charged that in the sugar schedule of the tariff act that Senators were corrupt. In all of those cases both the House and the Senate used the inherent power to punish for contempt. And the courts say that of necessity that power exists.

But even in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168) and in some of the reasoning in Dunn v. Anderson they say there is no doubt about it in impeachment matters; and in trying election cases you do not have to imply power. The Constitution expressly gives the authority to Congress to make this impeachment investigation. And Judge Marshall, in the case of McCullock v. Maryland, I believe it is, says that wherever the Constitution gives the Congress the power to do a certain thing all things that are necessary to carry out that power go with it incidentally, and one of those powers is the power either to protect itself from insult and assault by contempt proceedings.

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to this matter of punishment, you are familiar with the Duane case, are you not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. As I recollect the Duane case, so far as the punishment is concerned, they instructed the arrest——

Mr. WEBB (interposing). The Vice President?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the President, I think, in that case was instituting the proper prosecution. I do not find there was any statute then with reference to the Constitution for refusal to testify.

Mr. WEBB. No; that was passe in 1857.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, on what theory—have you thought of it—did the Senate in that case not exercise its own power of punishment, but passed it into the judicial branch of the Government?

Mr. WEBB. I am not sure, but——

The CHAIRMAN. Was that the Duane case?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That was punished by the Senate; and Duane was confined 30 days for the printing of that article in the Aurora.

Mr. NELSON. I remember that distinctly, if I may answer.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps I am mistaken.

Mr. NELSON. No; you are correct. There was the contempt by publication, and the Senate took jurisdiction, brought him to the bar of the House, and there was an indictment; he refused to testify; so he was held for about 30 days as a contumacious witness; then toward the end of the session of the Senate—the last day—it was obviously too little time to act upon it; so they simply disposed of the case by adopting—requesting the President to direct the law officer to bring action in the courts and the court sent him to jail for 30 days and assessed the cost upon him. The answer to your question is it was the last day and they had no further time, and that was the only way of disposing of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Congress has no power to punish beyond the term?

Mr. NELSON. Well, the Senate's term is a question of doubt. But let me emphasize this fact, that in that case you see the three branches of the Government have cooperated in punishing for contempt of a branch of the Congress.

Mr. WEBB. Here is what is said in the Duane case:

"The question of the power of the Senate to punish for contempt arose in 1800 in the case of William Duane over a publication in the General Advertiser or Aurora, which was found to be false, defamatory, scandalous, and malicious, and Duane was found to be in contempt of the Senate. He appeared before the Senate in response to first notice, but failed and declined to appear when ordered at a second date. This being at the end of the session, on the last day of the session he was ordered prosecuted by the courts of law, and was prosecuted and punished."

Here is what Senator Sumner says. He even says the House has more authority in a case of this sort than the Senate. He said in 1860:

"To the House of Representatives are given inquisitorial powers expressly by the Constitution, while no such powers are given to the Senate. This is expressed in the words, 'the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.' Here, then, obviously, is something delegated to the House, and not delegated to the Senate—namely, those inquiries which are in their nature preliminary to an impeachment—which may or may not end in impeachment; and since, by the Constitution, every 'civil officer' of the General Government may be impeached, the inquisitorial powers of the House may be directed against every 'civil officer,' from the President down to the lowest on the list."

This is an extract from Senator Sumner's speech in the Senate.

Now, I want to read another case. This is the most celebrated case ever written, in my opinion, of the power of the House to punish for contempt. It was written, as I said a while ago, by a court composed of such distinguished men as Judge Story and Judge Marshall. I will just quote one or two extracts here:

"This result is fraught with too much absurdity not to bring into doubt the soundness of any argument from which it is derived. That a deliberate assembly, clothed with the majesty of the people and charged with the care of all that is dear to them; composed of the most distinguished citizens, selected and drawn together from every quarter of a great Nation; whose deliberations are required by public opinion to be conducted under the eye of the public, and whose decisions must be clothed with all that sanctity which unlimited confidence in their wisdom and purity can inspire; that such an assembly should not possess the power to suppress rudeness or repel insult is a supposition too wild to be suggested."

Mr. MOON. Is that Justice Johnson's opinion?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. That opinion is full of just such expressions as that.

Mr. STERLING. How did that case come before the court?

Mr. WEBB. Suit was brought against the Sergeant at Arms. The Sergeant at Arms had Anderson, a witness, in custody, and it came up collaterally. They have held that in a direct order of the House for the arrest of a person the courts have no jurisdiction to take him out of the custody of the House, and can only be brought up collaterally, and not directly.

In Kilbourn v. Thompson, which I referred to a while ago——

Mr. STERLING. Was that suit for false imprisonment?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; that was what Kilbourn contended, that it is a case of false imprisonment. Kilbourn refusing to answer certain questions put to him by the House of Representatives concerning the business of a real estate partnership, concerning holdings of real estate, a real estate pool.

"The powers of Congress itself, when acting through the concurrence of both branches, are dependent solely on the Constitution. Such as are not conferred by that instrument, either expressly or by fair implication from what is granted, are 'reserved to the States respectively or to the people.' Of course, neither branch of Congress, when acting separately, can lawfully exercise more power than is conferred by the Constitution on the whole body, except in the few instances where authority is conferred on either House separately, as in the case of impeachments."

There, this judge, in Kilbourn v. Thompson, points out that the House of Representatives has more power than Congress combined has, because the Constitution confers that power solely upon the House of Representatives, and at other places in this same decision they refer to the great power of impeachment as authority that is not doubted at all.

If there is any doubt about the attitude of the Supreme Court on this question, since the opinion of Kilbourn v. Thompson, there has another case arisen, which you will find reported under title "In re

Chapman, petitioner, in 166 U. S., 661," and here again Chief Justice Fuller, writing the unanimous opinion of the court, in which Judge Harlan concurred——

Mr. NELSON. Justice White was on the court, too?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; reiterated the statement that the House of Representatives has the inherent power to punish for contempt.

This case arose in this manner. This man Chapman was indicted for refusing to answer questions and was convicted, but in 1857 the House of Representatives—Congress, rather—passed a law making it a misdemeanor for a witness to refuse to answer questions. When this case came to the Supreme Court, Chapman's counsel took the position that Congress, having passed that law, divested itself of the power to punish for contempt, because there could only be one offense, and if Congress was going to let the courts punish for refusing to answer questions, then the House itself could not do it.

This is what the court says:

"While Congress can not divest itself or either of its Houses of the inherent power to punish for contempt, it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House, and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States."

Although that is done, the House and Senate still have the inherent power to punish for contempt, etc.

"Under the Constitution the Senate of the United States has the power to try impeachments; to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members; to determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member; and it necessarily possesses the inherent power of self-protection.

"The refusal to answer pertinent questions in a matter of inquiry within the jurisdiction of the Senate, of course, constitutes a contempt of that body, and by the statute this is also made an offense against the United States.

"The history of congressional investigations demonstrates the difficulties under which the two Houses have labored, respectively, in compelling unwilling witnesses to disclose facts deemed essential to taking definite action, and we quite agree with Chief Justice Alvey, delivering the opinion of the court of appeals, 'that Congress possessed the constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legitimate functions'; and that it was to effect this that the act of 1857 was passed. It was an act necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in Congress and in each House thereof. We grant that Congress could not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the essential and inherent power to punish for contempt, in cases to which the power of either House properly extended: but, because Congress, by the act of 1857, sought to aid each of the Houses in the discharge of its constitutional functions, it does not follow that any delegation of the power in each to punish for contempt was involved, and the statute is not open to objection on that account.

"Nevertheless, although the power to punish for contempt still remains in each House, we must decline to decide that this law is invalid because it provides that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House, and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States, who are interested that the authority of neither of their departments, nor of any branch thereof, shall be defied and set at naught."

Gentlemen, that is all I care to say now. I have got a mass of matter here, but I want to refer you gentlemen to a recent report so ably presented by Judge DAVIS and Judge CRISP and the other members of that subcommittee.

Mr. CRISP. Judge NELSON.

Mr. WEBB. And Judge NELSON. They discussed the power of the House to punish for contempt. It is the only copy I have.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask, if you are through with your main argument, one or two questions upon the resolution before us. Were precedents followed concerning this resolution?

Mr. WEBB. I think so.

Mr. LENROOT. What I have especially in mind, the resolution which upon its face seems to delegate to this committee the power of finding the fact.

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Namely, the contempt.

Mr. WEBB. I think that is almost the resolution that is set out in the Sims-Glover case.

Mr. LENROOT. Was it the thought that this committee will find the fact—that the House has delegated to this committee its power over the subject?

Mr. STERLING. Do you say finding the fact, or reporting the fact?

Mr. LENROOT. Finding the fact.

Mr. WEBB. That is the same as reporting.

Mr. STERLING. I do not believe it is.

Mr. MOON. Then we want to report the procedure.

Mr. LENROOT. And the procedure, and in case they find a contempt has been committed to the end that the privilege of the House may be maintained.

Mr. NELSON. In the Sims case we found as a fact——

Mr. WEBB. Here is what was said:

"Resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed to investigate * * * for the purpose of ascertaining the facts, etc., that said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. LENROOT. Is it your idea that this committee shall find the fact, and that it shall then be conclusive upon the House, or the House itself, upon the proper matter getting before the House, will pass upon it?

Mr. WEBB. I think undoubtedly the House wants this committee to make a finding of fact. Of course no finding of fact will be binding upon the House if it wants to disregard it, but I think the House wants a finding of fact, and I think that is the course which has been pursued during years past.

Mr. STERLING. In that Glover case the committee recommended and set out the method of procedure, and the House followed it.

Mr. LENROOT. In some of the cases I notice in the reports, after finding the fact they set out the procedure by directing or recommending the method in which the trial shall go on in the House, questions to be asked by the Speaker, and so on. Whether it is necessary for us to go that far or not I do not know.

Mr. CRISP. We set that out. I remember a finding of facts was read to Glover when he was brought before the bar, and the Speaker asked him if he desired to be heard, by himself or attorney, and he admitted the facts, and the whole procedure was set out.

Mr. MOON. Where they do not admit the facts the procedure should then go further and show the manner in which the trial should be held.

Mr. STERLING. I know one or two instances where the trial was had before the House. It would be perfectly proper to refer it to a committee.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that would be true. I was wondering whether that was the thought in the mind in this resolution, or whether it was merely a recommendation of the committee to go before the House.

Mr. CRISP. The House practically refers the contest of the seating of its own Members to a committee. The House does not take up the question of facts there. For instance, the Election Committee finds all facts, then makes a report.

Mr. LENROOT. It goes to the method of our report, whether we report and that report is sustained, or whether the House itself shall have the right.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Chairman, Judge NELSON and Judge GARD are here.

Mr. MOON. We shall be glad to hear from both of them. Which one of the gentlemen will address the committee?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to say anything further on this resolution. I do not know whether it be true or not, although there may be evidence of the slime of the serpent, that the munition plants in the United States are more profoundly interested in the acquittal of this man than the House is in his conviction. I have no comment to make upon that question. I express surprise, however, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] who has manifested such a profound interest in this case to-day should have said when he began his argument that he had not expected to discuss this matter until he came into the House. His able and polished argument would indicate that the gentleman was exceedingly apt in extemporaneous discussions, if he had not had some idea of making a speech on this matter. He is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. He discussed that matter before that committee——

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM. Of course the gentleman does not mean to question the accuracy of my statement?

Mr. MOON. I am not going to question it at all.

Mr. GRAHAM. Let me finish. I was familiar with this matter in the Judiciary Committee——

Mr. MOON. Yes; and the gentleman is familiar with it here.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not have to commit my speeches to memory in order to make them.

Mr. MOON. Oh, no; the gentleman does not, nor do I, and not many of us have to do that; but, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman's statement is taken as correct. I am not going to impugn his statement that he said that he had not given the matter any thought before, or had not expected to speak, but I am advised by the subcommittee that he was practically the counsel for Mr. Marshall before it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. Oh, I know from information——

Mr. GRAHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. In a moment. I know from information from the select committee that he had asked for time, or, at least, they so stated it as long as two weeks ago. That is all right. I have no objection to that——

Mr. GRAHAM. The gentleman is making personal remarks.

Mr. MOON. No; I am not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should not address another Member until he has yielded.

Mr. MOON. I will just express surprise, if those things are true, that the gentleman should have said what he did. I would not reflect upon the gentleman. Everything he said may be true, but it surprises me nevertheless.

Mr. GRAHAM rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; no further. I want now to take up one point that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] made. He insisted that because the President had the power to remove an offending officer we must resort to that; but the law and the Constitution require no such thing. It often happens that the Executive who appoints an officer will stand by him and support him in his error—though, I think, that would not be true in this case—and therefore the Constitution has reserved the right to the people to impeach, regardless of the force and power of the Executive with which the officer in question may be connected. There is absolutely nothing in such a contention. It is idle. Gentlemen here, and some of them from New York, have said that the committee did not have the power to command, or to request, rather, the notes of the grand jury in New York State. I assert—and no lawyer living who is worthy of the name will dispute it—that every tribunal, judicial or otherwise, that has the power, the right, to make inquiry into the performance of any particular act has the power to make a demand for the minutes of any court or of any grand jury, in any jurisdiction it may be, that would concern the fact under investigation. The court controlling the minutes, in view of public policy prevailing, will grant the request or not; but the right to make it exists and the right to have them under ordinary circumstances exists. This is what another district attorney in New York, Mr. Edward Swann, thinks: He says that he had investigated the question thoroughly and run down all of the decisions upon the question, and that the practice in the State of New York is to concede the production of the minutes before the tribunals of the country that demand them, and the Federal court, under the Constitution, must follow the practice of the State court.

The question is already settled and determined against the contention of the gentleman in the case of Glynn against The People and Montgomery against The People in 185–186 New York, so that defense falls to the ground. Suppose that they did not have the right to receive them; that they were refused upon demand. Would that be any evidence of the fact that the committee were exercising or attempting to exercise authority beyond its jurisdiction? Would that be any reason why this committee, sitting there with the power and authority of this House, should be gratuitously insulted by the man whose conduct was under investigation? He had control of the minutes. Why did he refuse to let them be seen? If he was not guilty of the acts of tyranny and oppression charged against him, he should have submitted the minutes and settled the question. I do not believe, sir, that any honest, conscientious man who understands these facts and is willing to protect his own honor, his own dignity, and that of his country and the American House of Representatives will refuse to hale this man to the bar of the House that he may answer in person to the charges of contempt. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 209, nays 85, answered "present" 16, not voting 124, as follows:

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "nay." I find that I am paired with the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. GUERNSEY was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LONGWORTH. I withdraw my vote of "yea" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. ALLEN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MADDEN. I voted "nay," but I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. ROUSE was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr KENNEDY, and I voted "yea." I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. TAGUE was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those gentlemen who have spoken on this question be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all the gentlemen who have spoken on this resolution have a right to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, when the fortification bill was up the other day and without knowing that to-day was to be given over to this special matter that we have been considering, it was agreed by both sides that the bill should be called up to-day for consideration of the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER]. Personally, I am perfectly willing to go forward with the matter now if the House wishes to do so.

Mr. MANN. We do not wish to do so.

Mr. SHERLEY. I simply thought it was due to the House to make the statement in order to find out whether they desired to go into the Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the fortification bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. The best way to test that is to make a motion.

Mr. MANN. I thought we had an understanding that it would come up Thursday.

Mr. SHERLEY. In the event it does not come up this afternoon it probably will go over until Thursday, as I understand to-morrow has been given over to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. In order that the matter may be determined I can make the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not do that to-night.

Mr. SHERLEY. I can make that motion, and then the motion to adjourn can be made.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, before that is done I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Kentucky any suggestion?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not see in the House some of the gentlemen who are specially interested in the pending question on the fortifications bill. I do not want to take advantage of anybody. I give notice that the first thing on Thursday morning I will move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] gives notice that on Thursday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and so forth, he will move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the fortifications appropriation bill.

HOUR OF MEETING ON THURSDAY.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. on Thursday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend remarks on the Marshall resolution, which has just been agreed to.

Mr. MOON. I believe that leave was given.

The SPEAKER. It was given to gentlemen who addressed the House. Did the gentleman from North Carolina make a speech on that subject?

Mr. SMALL. I did not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Moon resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 21, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16068) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a wagon bridge across the Black River at or near Bennetts Ferry, Ark., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 822), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DECKER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16097) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City, Mo., authorized by an act approved June 17, 1914, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 823), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ESTOPINAL: A bill (H. R. 16531) making an appropriation for erecting and equipping and otherwise providing a quarantine station at or near New Orleans, La.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 16532) authorizing an adjustment of the boundaries of the Whitman National Forest in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 16533) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to purchase additional land adjoining the site of the post office in the borough of Tarentum, Pa.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 16534) to authorize the commissioners of Lycoming County, Pa., and their successors in office to construct a bridge across the West Branch of the Susquehanna River from the foot of Arch Street, in the city of Williamsport, Lycoming County, Pa., to the borough of Duboistown, Lycoming County, Pa.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MURRAY: Resolution (H. Res. 266) directing the Committee on Indian Affairs to investigate educational institutions to which Indian pupils are permitted to attend; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FINLEY: Resolution (H. Res. 267) to print 1,250 copies of the pamphlet entitled "Soil survey of Chesterfield County, S. C.," for the use of the House document room; to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 16535) granting an increase of pension to James McCoy; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16536) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Finley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASWELL: A bill (H. R. 16537) removing the charge of desertion of John C. Davis; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BARNHART: A bill (H. R. 16538) granting an increase of pension to John N. Kirkendall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLACK: A bill (H. R. 16539) granting an increase of pension of Mary E. Flippo, wife of George J. Flippo, of Company F, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CASEY: A bill (H. R. 16540) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of William Sorber, deceased; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHARLES: A bill (H. R. 16541) granting a pension to Priscilla J. Raisbeck; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DAVENPORT: A bill (H. R. 16542) granting a pension to Claud V. Chambers; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16543) granting an increase of pension to George H. Skeens; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16544) for the relief of Rose Martin; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MURRAY: A bill (H. R. 16545) granting an increase of pension to Isaac C. Pierce; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16546) granting a pension to William P. Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill (H. R. 16547) granting an increase of pension to George W. Neely; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHACKLEFORD: A bill (H. R. 16548) granting a pension to Harriett A. Boles; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STINESS: A bill (H. R. 16549) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to John W. Sweeney of certain land in the town of Westerly, R. I.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TALBOTT: A bill (H. R. 16550) granting a pension to Charles W. G. Riechart; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TAVENNER: A bill (H. R. 16551) granting an increase of pension to George W. Fields; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAILEY: Protest of George E. Long, Martha J. Long, Edna Miller Thom, Frank Thom, Anna M. Miller, Gertrude Griffith, D. A. Robb, Hugh V. Mack, Lillie Mack Robb, Mrs. S. P. Mack, Mrs. L. D. Sherman, Authur Mack, Helen Mack, B. A. Long, C. S. Long, Mrs. N. B. Caldwell, Mrs. P. Lavelle, Miss Vernie M. Bowser, Miss M. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1916.

(Legislative day of Tuesday, June 20, 1916.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

DAUPHIN ISLAND RAILWAY & HARBOR CO.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Vice President may lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 4476, a bridge bill, and that the Senate may concur in the amendments It only changes the bill as it passed the Senate by limiting the time to two and a half years, the Senate having extended it five years.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4476) to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands, as amended by an act approved June 18, 1912, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by the act entitled 'An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands,' approved June 18, 1912, is hereby extended to two years and four years, respectively, from and after the 18th day of September, 1916," and to amend the title so as to read: "An act extending the time for the commencement and completion of the bridge or bridges authorized by an act entitled 'An act to amend an act to authorize the Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors or assigns, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges or viaducts across the water between the mainland at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, both Little and Big; also to dredge a channel from the deep waters of Mobile Bay into Dauphin Bay; also to construct and maintain docks and wharves along both Little and Big Dauphin Islands,' approved June 18, 1912."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hollis	Oliver	Smith, Md.
Borah	Husting	Overman	Smoot
Brandegee	James	Page	Sterling
Bryan	Johnson, Me.	Phelan	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Tillman
Clapp	Jones	Poindexter	Townsend
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pomerene	Underwood
Culberson	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Cummins	Lodge	Saulsbury	Walsh
Curtis	McLean	Shafroth	Warren
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Williams
Fletcher	Myers	Sherman	Works
Gallinger	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is detained from the Senate on important public business.

Mr. CUMMINS. My colleague [Mr. KENYON] is detained at home by the serious illness of his mother. I desire that this announcement shall stand throughout the day.

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TAGGART]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is unavoidably detained by reason of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NAVAL MANAGEMENT AND DISCIPLINE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on March 5, 1913, the Navy Department was given over to the supervision of Secretary Daniels. For 16 years it had been directed by Republican administrations. One of these embraced nearly half that period. At its head was Theodore Roosevelt, whose genius and capacity for the efficient and unflagging exercise of Executive authority, both in and out of office, is asserted by himself and admitted by his friends to be unequaled and unsurpassed anywhere in any age. During these 16 years over $1,500,000,000 was appropriated for and expended upon the Navy. Excepting Great Britain, this sum was greater than that expended in the same interval for the same purpose by any other nation. During that period, also, those in charge of public affairs were fairly well satisfied both with the size and efficiency of the fleet and entirely so with their management and administration of the Naval Department. In demonstration of this, Mr. Roosevelt, with characteristic audacity, assembled our battleships and sent them on a wild-goose chase around the world in 1908, at an expense of a few trifling millions, and felicitated himself upon devising a happy expedient for impressing the nations of the world with our invincible strength at sea and at the same time with a due and appropriate sense of his own capacious resourcefulness. It was assumed, perhaps with some temerity, but with a fair degree of confidence in the integrity of official assurances, that whatever weaknesses or deficiencies existed in other departments of the Government, the Navy was well manned, well managed, and second in rank with the navies of other nations when President Taft made way for his successor. This pleasant conviction remained with us constant and almost unchallenged until the outbreak of war in Europe. It was then rudely disturbed and denounced largely, if not wholly, by those who had captured our confidence and who were solely responsible for naval and Army conditions. They revealed to the public that our Navy was weak, inefficient, undermanned, obsolete, disorganized, badly officered, unbalanced, and fit only for the scrap heap; that our coasts were therefore defenseless, our cities exposed to the ravages of war, and our wealth to the mercy of any national buccaneer whose animosity or cupidity might suggest their exploitation.

And for these horrible conditions the present Secretary of the Navy was charged with the responsibility. He was said to lack experience, common sense, patriotism, serious purpose, initiative, and organizing capacity; that he knew nothing and refused to learn anything; that he was a faddist, cursed with absurd and Puritanical theories, insistent upon trying them on the Navy, and unmindful of the counsel or the wishes of the old and experienced authorities under whose far-seeing and benignant supervision the fleet had been improvised. Because of him our ships were underofficered and undermanned, our stores of ammunition inadequate, and our guns inferior to those of other nations. Because of him our submarines could not dive nor our torpedo-boat destroyers navigate. Because of him our dreadnaughts were obsolete and our shipyards dilatory in building more. Because of him we were forced to regard the product of our former vast naval appropriations fit only for the discard, and the marine forces inefficient, untrained, and demoralized. Because of him America, though building and constructing for 30 years, had neither Navy nor naval program. So malign and baleful, indeed, had been the conduct of this man since his recent assumption of naval authority that the skeleton of a fleet, which his predecessors had evolved through a long and dreary process of public expenditure, was falling to pieces, and, Switzerland excepted, we were less prepared on sea than the people of any other country. Should England conclude to suspend her blockade of German ports for a brief period and direct her energies on sea to the destruction of our wealthy but helpless coast communities; or should the Kaiser's fleet break through the British cordon of floating steel and postpone its offensive against Great Britain, until it had filled its coffers with New York gold; or should France, or Austria, or Russia, or even Italy create a diversion by sudden descent upon our inviting and unprotected shores, nothing, not even the God of battles, could save our hapless land from the invader's legions. Or if Japan, having captured the German garrison at Tientsin and imposed her terms on China, should suddenly swoop down upon San Francisco with half a dozen ships she could easily invest and occupy the city and use it as a base for inland conquest. That she has not done so is due wholly to her pacific disposition, a state of mind easily subject to change, if not to transformation. For all of this, according to these critics, the Secretary of the Navy is responsible, and Providence only stands between us and destruction.

To heighten the public apprehension and with it the public resentment toward this recreant official, appeals have been made to its ears and eyes by conventions, pamphlets, press announcements, and moving pictures. The Battle Cry of Peace, traveling the country's length and breadth, witnessed by fear-stricken millions, staged and advertised without regard to expense, had brought his iniquities home to every community. These have seen with their own eyes to what his shortcomings have exposed his countrymen. It pictures the landing of the barbarian, the sacking of our cities, and the pillage of our bankers, trust magnates, oil princes, exchange brokers, munitions makers, and other defenseless but deserving people. The lesson of this terrible vision has been driven home by Aviation Leagues, National Defense Leagues, American Defense Leagues, National Security Leagues, Navy Leagues, Army Leagues, Patriotic Sons' Leagues, Patriotic Daughters' Leagues, Roosevelt Leagues, and preparedness processions. One league convention scarce adjourns before another league rings up the curtain, all thundering the one chorus, "Our coast defenses are worthless; our Navy is obsolete, demoralized, and inefficient; our shores unprotected; our wealth insecure; and our people helpless. Let Daniels be anathema."

Mr. President, I have read with some interest and more curiosity the newspaper accounts of the convention proceedings of these multitudinous leagues. Many of these doubtless mean well, but it is more than a coincidence that nearly all of them were spawned with the early munitions contracts of the allies and have expanded pari passu with the expansion of munitions manufactories.

Their proceedings vary chiefly in the names of their speakers and of the hotels or halls where they talk with raucous monotony to their congregated members, none of whom show any keenness for putting their principles into action by enlisting in this much-needed army of which they talk so glibly. They denounce our criminally defenseless condition; they censure the existing administration for that condition. They demand the immediate organization of a huge standing army and the building of a huger navy. They assert our present Navy to be no Navy at all, and inferior to those of all other first-class powers. The hysterical ones encourage and applaud the complaints and criticisms of every man, particularly every naval man, out of touch with the Secretary of the Navy, and hiss the name of Daniels whenever it is uttered.

A former Secretary of the Navy, the erstwhile petted and complacent darling of the old naval régime, has not hesitated, if he tells the truth, to advertise his own deplorable incompetency by libeling the character of the fleet and win applause by impudently shifting the alleged consequences of his own chronic ineptitude upon the shoulders of his successor.

"Preparedness" magazines, newspapers, and pamphleteers have taken up and prolonged this chorus of Mr. Daniels's vilification. Some of these have descended to the levels of epithet and of diatribe.

An ex-President of the United States, the only public man of his generation who is at all times righteous, honest, truthful, capable, courageous, candid, consistent, invincible, and honorable has pronounced his fulminate upon this unpardonable official sinner, thus completing the circle of the denunciation.

Mr. President, among the critics of the Secretary is one Henry Reuterdahl, who, in 1908, on the occasion of the circumnavigation of the globe by our fleet, wrote a series of articles in criticism of our Navy, and particularly designed to exhibit the insufficiency and unscientific methods of the construction of our battleships. The result was the holding of an inquiry by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs and a second investigation of the charges which this gentleman made. At that time, when Rear Admiral Converse appeared before the committee, this sentiment was summed up by Senator MARTIN thus:

> It appears to me that if a first-class deserted island can be found in the Pacific orders should be sent to Admiral Evans to dump Reuterdahl onto it. Such action would go far toward avoiding a repetition of such affairs.

Just before adjournment Senator Perkins said to the naval officers:

> We ought to apologize to you for calling upon you to refute such an article as this.
> That's true—

Said Senator Hale—

> but it's written in such a vein that a layman could not understand how absurd the charges are. It attracted the attention of the whole country, and we had to investigate.

Mr. President, if a tithe of the sins of commission or of omission with which Secretary Daniels has been charged during the last 12 months were true, he should be relieved of his great office, and no man should lift his voice in protest. If a tithe be true, his detractors might find partial justification for their conduct. If a tithe be true, the administration should be disciplined because responsible for him. It is not true; and I firmly believe that no one knows this better than the great majority of his detractors. Indeed, I might go further and assert that the campaign of slander and misrepresentation waged and waging against this upright and courageous Cabinet officer has been largely inspired by men in and out of the Navy who can not use him and who are therefore determined, if they can, to force his removal or to crush him.

He is an obstacle to the material, the farseeing, the profit-making side of "preparedness," and since he will not bend or step aside he must be broken or run over. The pack has been unleashed, and Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart in full cry are baying at his heels.

What has the Secretary done, or omitted doing, that has started this avalanche of denunciation? His duty; that is all. And he has done it quietly, modestly, and effectively. He has also done it courageously. He has been undaunted by the voices of the mighty, the power of cabals, the tinsel of epauletted aristocracy, or the self-interest of Navy contractors. And he goes upon his course undismayed and unshaken by the obloquy of the disappointed.

The changes and reforms introduced into the Navy Department by Mr. Daniels which have chiefly given offense are:

1. Enforcement of the law requiring competitive bidding by armor-plate manufacturers for armor-plate contracts.
2. The abolition of Mr. Meyer's aids to the Secretary and the substitution of a Chief of Naval Operations.
3. Extending to the officers' mess room Secretary Long's order of 1899, prohibiting on board ship the use of alcoholic liquors by sailors and seamen.
4. The establishment of naval schools on the ships, in addition to those on shore, for the technical education of enlisted men, and making them eligible to promotions.
5. His advocacy of Government-owned armor-plate and munition plants.

Other policies have been inaugurated in the department not at all congenial to the conservatism of the past. These, however, I shall not discuss.

First. Prior to this administration, bidding on armor plate for the Navy was farcical. A representative of each of the three plate manufacturers would come to Washington at the appointed times, register at the same hotel, dine together, hold a conference, and then send bids to the Secretary in identical amounts for the same contract. The complacent predecessors of Secretary Daniels would receive and accept these bids and assign the contracts to one of them, nominally perhaps, but to all of them in reality. Of course such bidding violated the spirit of the law, was in no sense competitive, and wholly to the disadvantage of the Government. But it was part of the price paid by previous administrations for the political support of these manufacturers.

In April, 1913, Senator ASHURST denounced this practice on the floor of the Senate and demanded its investigation. Secretary Daniels, apprised of its nature, properly and promptly terminated it. Since then bids for armor plate have been the good old-fashioned ones, and the lowest responsible bidder has secured the contracts.

When we learn that the Secretary's requirements have effected a saving to the Government thus far of $1,110,084 on armor-plate purchases and a further saving of many millions more on contracts for the immediate future, we can measure in some degree the dimensions of armor-plate animosities which this policy has aroused. And when to this is added the millions he has saved through Government manufacture of smokeless powder and the $1,077,200 he has cut from a single bid for projectiles, we can also appreciate the depth of resentment he has aroused in other directions.

Those who would return to the good old days, when the bidders and contractors had their own way, when Secretaries of the Navy performed their duties perfunctorily or vicariously, when they were but receivers and transmitters for their aids, can see no merit in these changed conditions; but those who appreciate thoroughness and integrity in public affairs, economy of administration, and strict enforcement of the law will give to the quiet and imperturbable gentleman now directing the affairs of the Navy Department the reward of their unqualified approbation.

Second. Mr. Daniels's immediate predecessor appointed four aids to the Secretary. These aids—for operation, personnel, matériel, and inspection—formed a sort of cabal or cabinet, which ruled the Navy. Mr. Thomas P. Ivy, an intelligent and valued citizen of New Hampshire, thus describes the operations of this quartet:

> The Secretary knew nothing of the Navy except what this small cabinet permitted him to know, and no officer in the Navy, however meritorious he might be, who was out of favor of this cabinet clique, had full and free opportunity to make use of his ability in the service of the Government and the people. Such a cabinet of aids was a distinct disadvantage to the Navy, because its ideals were undemocratic, tending to crush out every particle of individuality in the Navy and to create a pliant and wholly subservient machine. Looking forward to this consummation, this cabinet of aids mapped out a plan in which they assigned every officer's place and promotion as far ahead as the year 1925. The book in which this program is plotted I have seen myself, and know the statement is based upon an undeniable fact. In this scheme of promotions, this cabinet of aids first of all provided for their friends, giving them the most desirable positions in the Navy, without that strict regard for professional capacity and qualification without which no navy can be efficient. When Mr. Daniels became Secretary, this clique set about to take him over to their views and to use him as a mere tool for carrying out their plans, as they had done with Mr. Meyer. Mr. Daniels not only refused the overtures of this clique, but found himself compelled to get rid of it and put himself in direct touch with the heads of the bureaus of the Navy, under men who knew what the Navy needs and what ought to be done.

Congress had refused to legalize this council of aids which Mr. Daniels very properly describes as a fifth wheel in organization. He suggested that Congress follow the recommendations of the Moody Board, which it did, and authorized the appointment of a Chief of Naval Operations. To this place Admiral Benson was appointed. This admirable and efficient officer has thoroughly organized the varied operations of the Naval Department. The bureaus are under his immediate supervision, the bureau chiefs are his aids, and the Navy is in better condition than ever before.

Mr. Daniels, in effectuating this needed change, made no rash incursion into untried fields of experiment. He had behind him the sound judgment and ripe experience of men old in the service. I need perhaps only quote Admiral Melville, who said:

> I have always been a consistent supporter of the bureau system, which, I earnestly believe, under a civilian Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Navy and its expert bureau chiefs, is the only mode of successfully conducting the business of the Navy Department of a Republic.

But one who rudely disturbs an evil like this, who deprives a cabal of its power by displacing its members and abolishing the system, must expect trouble, and plenty of it. Men do not yield their views, much less their places, with resignation. Their anger is aroused not only, but their malice as well. These find circulation in slander, innuendo, and falsehood, beneath which the real cause of commotion may be concealed or forgotten by an inconsiderate or careless public. I quote again from Mr. Ivy:

> To the fact that he dismissed this clique, who controlled Mr. Meyer, and reestablished a modified bureau system of direct contact with the bureau heads of the Navy is due the attacks that are made on Secretary Daniels's administration of the Navy Department. One of the officers in the Navy who has been the most persistent in criticizing Secretary Daniels can not himself be said to be free from imperfection, for the late Admiral Robley D. Evans, whenever he saw this officer coming toward him, was wont to exclaim, "Please somebody protect me from that * * *." Almost before he entered his private office the option was offered him of becoming a parrot, as Mr. Meyer had been, and saying only what he was told to say, or of meeting opposition and abuse from this clique and their friends if he attempted to assert his rights as civilian head of the Navy. History, that works out all truths in time, will give to Secretary Daniels full credit for choosing rather to do his duty toward the Navy itself and the Government and people, for whose service the Navy was created.

I have little doubt that Mr. Daniels's predecessor, who has been most prominent in making these attacks, is the willing mouthpiece of the cabal whose members, under the shelter of his office, controlled our naval affairs. He coolly asserted last January, according to the New York Sun, that there were no brains in the Navy now. Yet his are the only brains which have been separated from the department since he left it. Fortunately common sense and common honesty are there, a combination sometimes superior to brains bereft of either.

I read, Mr. President, a list of the heads of bureaus in the Navy Department, commencing with Admiral George Dewey:

Admiral of the Navy George Dewey, honored with this exceptional rank for life and given the thanks of Congress for his victory in Manila Bay, has been head of the General Board since its organization in 1903. Associated with him are some very able naval officers. Rear Admiral A. M. Knight has actually made the War College during this administration what its name implies, by the aid of Secretary Daniels's hearty cooperation, increased its faculty from 7 officers under Mr. Meyer and 5 students to 9 officers and 32 officer-students, while 400 officers are taking correspondence courses in strategy. Rear Admiral Badger was commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, and made the remarkable get-away from Hampton Roads to Vera Cruz within 36 hours of receiving his orders to sail. So valuable were his services that he was continued on the board for a year after his retirement. Rear Admiral W. S. Benson, first Chief of Naval Operations, has made this office in the year of his incumbency the equal of any European general staff, and has seen the Navy better organized and prepared than ever before in its history. Maj. Gen. George Barnett, commandant of the Marine Corps, has been a leader in training his corps in advance-base work. Other officers of the General Board of recognized ability are Capts. H. S. Knapp; W. L. Rogers; J. H. Oliver, Director of Naval Intelligence; S. S. Wood; C. F. Hughes; and Commander H. J. Ziegemeier, jr.

But George von L. Meyer is gone, and there is left in the Navy "no brain."

Admiral F. F. Fletcher, who handled the difficult and delicate situation at Vera Cruz during the American occupation in 1914 with consummate skill and ability, has recently been detached from the command of the Atlantic Fleet and been ordered to the General Board. He has been succeeded by Vice Admiral Henry T. Mayo, the first American Navy officer to hold the rank of vice admiral. Admiral C. McR. Winslow, of distinguished bravery in the Spanish-American War, commands the Pacific Fleet, and Admiral Albert G. Winterhalter, who was the Secretary of the Navy's remarkably efficient aid for matériel for four years, is commander in chief of the Asiatic Fleet.

But Meyer is gone, and the Navy no longer has any brain!

At the head of the Bureau of Navigation is Rear Admiral Victor Blue, whose daring expeditions in locating Cervera's fleet in Santiago Harbor made his name famous around the world. He penetrated the Spanish gunboat blockade in an armed ship's boat, met Gen. Gomez, and captured two Spanish patrol sloops as he ran out of the harbor.

But Meyer is gone, and the Navy has "no brain."

At the head of the Bureau of Steam Engineering is Rear Admiral Robert S. Griffin, whose service in this position has been signalized by the adoption of the electric drive in the propulsion of battleships and by the perfection of radio communication service.

But Meyer is gone, and the Navy has "no brain."

Rear Admiral Joseph Strauss, Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance, has no peer in any navy as an ordnance expert. He completed the Government powder factory at Indianhead and was in charge of it when the Government made its first powder, and its growth and expansion has been largely due to his brain and zeal.

Yet, since Meyer has been retired to private life by the will of the people, the Navy has no brain.

Rear Admiral David W. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, first honor graduate of Annapolis and postgraduate with honors from the British College at Greenwich, perfected the center line of fire on battleships and has contributed enormously to the perfection of the design and protection of ships.

But Meyer has gone, and with him all semblance of brain in the Navy.

Rear Admiral Samuel McGowan, as Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, has brought this important bureau, which handles enormous funds and has supervision of all supplies, up to the highest degree of efficiency.

But with the passing of Meyer brains have disappeared from the Navy.

Rear Admiral W. C. Braisted, Surgeon General of the Navy, whose report on the medicine and surgery of Japan during the Russo-Japanese war, attracted the favorable attention of the scientific world, has brought the Medical Corps up to a high condition of effectiveness and will see it increase from 347 to 500, with two Hospital Corps training schools established and a new hospital ship authorized and under construction.

Yet Meyer has gone, and the Navy has no brains.

Under Capt. Ridley McLean, Judge Advocate General of the Navy, the entire naval penal system has been improved and naval prisoners tremendously reduced, while the laws of the country as they affect the Navy has been codified in a masterly manner.

But Meyer is gone, and the Navy has lost its brains.

With none to stand between the Secretary and his bureau heads, with merit as the test of promotion, with economy the watchword and the rule, and with system in operation throughout the department, one may well appreciate the unqualified assertion of Admiral Dewey, that Mr. Daniels has given us a Navy which "is not excelled except in size by the fleet of any nation in the world."

I have, Mr. President, a copy of the letter of the admiral in which that quotation is made, bearing date the 14th of May, 1915, and ask to insert it in full at this stage of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

MAY 14, 1915.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I trust that you will be good enough to convey to the mayor and citizens of New York City my sincere regret at my inability to be present at the ceremonies incident to the review of the Atlantic Fleet, and my cordial appreciation of the hospitality they have shown in the reception of the officers and men.

On this occasion I recall with the utmost pleasure the magnificent welcome I received in their great city upon my return from Manila on board the Olympia in September, 1899, and it is a source of deep satisfaction to know that the interest of our citizens in their great Navy has not diminished in the 16 years that have elapsed since that time.

The people of New York have just cause for pride in the fleet now assembled in their harbor. Not only is it composed of the finest and most efficient warships that we have ever had but it is not excelled in size by the fleet of any nation in the world; our ships and guns are as good as any in the world; our officers are as good as any; and our enlisted men are superior in training, education, physical development, and devotion to duty, to those of any other navy. As president of the General Board for the last 15 years I can say with absolute confidence that the efficiency of the fleet has steadily progressed and has never been so high as it is to-day.

However, we need more ships, more officers, and more men, and should continue the wise policy of increasing the size of our Navy, which must ever remain our first and best line of defense. This defense unless adequate is impotent; and adequacy is not reached until the Navy is strong enough to meet on equal terms the navy of the strongest probable adversary.

Very sincerely, yours, GEORGE DEWEY.

Hon. JOSEPHUS DANIELS,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

Mr. THOMAS. President Wilson, Commander in Chief of the Navy, made this official statement:

I was greatly struck by the appearance of the fleet and the quiet efficiency shown by the officers and men, as I am sure everyone must have been who had the pleasure of seeing it assembled at New York.

There could have been no more interesting verification of Admiral Dewey's statement that the Navy was never in a better and more efficient condition, and that the country has every reason not only to be proud of it, but every reason to wish to go forward in its policy of steadily adding to its strength and equipment.

But the venom which seeks to discredit the Secretary has not confined itself to him alone. It has been directed against his appointees; against Griffin, of the Bureau of Steam Engineering; Strauss, of the Bureau of Ordnance; Taylor, of the Bureau of Construction and Repair; Benson, Chief of the Bureau of Naval Operations; Blue, of the Bureau of Navigation; Wurtzbaugh, the Secretary's most efficient aide. Indeed, calumny would fasten itself upon Admiral Dewey, a loyal supporter of the prevailing naval policy, were its courage at all proportionate to its vindictive animosity.

Third. The prohibition of the use of alcoholic liquors on shipboard by men in the Army and Navy is a subject neither new nor national. It commanded the thoughtful consideration of soldiers, statesmen, and reformers long before the outbreak of the European war. That war gave signal demonstration of its necessity in the orders of all the great powers engaged in the conflict save Great Britain, where Lloyd George denounced drink as a foe more formidable to the empire than Germany. Lord Charles Beresford had before then protested against the use of liquor in the British Navy, and the German Emperor assured his naval cadets before the war began that "the nation which consumes the least alcohol wins."

Secretary Long in 1899, doubtless actuated by the experiences of the Spanish-American War, issued an order forbidding the sale or issue of liquors to enlisted men on board ship. He was the pioneer of a movement since become general. We may be sure that this order was not humbly received or eagerly enforced; but it nevertheless became effective, and, as it was confined to the enlisted men, the officers were not affected by it.

Yet every reason requiring such an order for enlisted men applies with added force to their superiors, upon whom rests all the responsibility for both men and ships. If the man in the ranks should at all times possess a clear mind and a sound body, his commander should be no whit behind him. If the use of alcohol deprives the enlisted man of these essentials or tends to undermine or weaken them, the same is true of the midshipman, the lieutenant, the captain, and the admiral. Hence 14 years should not have intervened between the issuance of the order of 1899 regarding the rank and file and its extension to all the officers of the line. It would be strange, indeed, if during this period the enlisted man should not have challenged the justice of an order, which, denying him the privilege of drink, should exempt his commander from its operation. Nothing more weakens the morale of an army or navy than a sense of injustice. I dare affirm that the percentage of offenses and desertions by embittered men would decline rapidly toward zero if discriminations between men and officers, such as the Long order established, were systematically avoided.

Acting upon the official recommendation of the Surgeon General of the Navy, Mr. Daniels extended Secretary Long's order to officers, much to the amazement and disgust of many of them. The notion that the convivialities of an officer and a gentleman should be prohibited because the good of the service required it was preposterous. Because a seaman should lead an abstemious life was no sort of reason that his commander should do so. Indeed the social demands of his more lofty position required him to maintain and patronize his own stock of liquors. Hence to many the order was absurd, ridiculous, outrageous, humiliating, and unbearable. What would be thought of a naval officer on duty who could not drink when he pleased? What would foreign naval officers say of such a monstrous regulation? Would they not make merry over the silly and contemptible requirement? Indeed it was a dangerous rule, for did not a certain admiral, warmly welcomed nowadays whenever a defense league meets to shriek "preparedness" and to damn the Secretary, warn Mr. Daniels that the order, if enforced, might substitute opium and cocaine for whisky in the officers' mess rooms? According to his view, these gentlemen must have stimulant, and if the usual one were denied others more deadly and sinister might be substituted. But the Secretary was firm and the order stands.

It not only stands, but it was the forerunner of similar orders in nearly every navy of the world. It has made our officers and our men amenable to the same requirement affecting their health and their efficiency. It has given the man on the decks a strong assurance of the equity and justice which this administration practices in naval discipline. But it has opened the floodgates of ridicule, of abuse, and of lampoon upon the devoted head of Mr. Daniels. But for this order his other breaches of naval proprieties might have been condoned. Promotions, demotions, reorganizations, disorganizations, schools for enlisted men, disregard of advisory manuscripts, carefully composed and as carefully filed away, all these might have been borne had the cocktail been spared. But the iconoclast whose ruthless hand dashed the champagne glass upon the deck and banished the gin rickey from the mess room forever is a creature too odious to have been born of woman. Therefore away with him!

But the sober common sense of the people has long since recognized not only the justice but the practical need of this celebrated order. The average man has laughed good humoredly at the diatribes and cartoons which magazine and newspaper have leveled at the Secretary; but the aim of the order he has admired and approved, as also the wisdom in announcing and the courage in enforcing it. He knows that water for the officer's mess room is quite as essential to the good of the Navy as water for the deckman; that a sober soldier needs a sober commander, and that without such assurance the soldier's abstinence may prove profitless. And he knows, too, that the application of the same rule to all squares with the soldier's se of justice and reconciles him to a self-denial which were otherwise quickened by a sense of wrong. The seaman has responded to this situation by enlisting to the maximum of our naval strength for the first time and by reenlisting in larger and ever-increasing proportion. And the officers are yielding with less and less reluctance to the requirements of the order. A distinguished admiral, who first opposed it, now says it is the best thing the Secretary ever did. Since the outbreak of the world war many of them have doubtless inwardly acknowledged its value. Nor have they turned for stimulant either to opium or to cocaine. That unworthy suggestion was promptly spurned by every man in whose interests it was presumably made. And who is there so bold as to declare that Mr. Daniels's successor, be he Democrat or Republican, will dare to set this order aside?

Such a one would call upon the mountains to hide him from the indignant wrath of an aroused nation ere the ink had dried upon his signature to the order of reversal. The new régime has come to stay, and in due season the honor for it will also come to the quiet but determined man who ordained it.

Fourth. In addition to those at the naval stations, the Secretary has established schools on board ships, in order to give all enlisted men desiring to avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded to acquire technical knowledge, making them eligible for promotions to higher positions. He has since determined to supplement these with summer schools on board ships, modeled after the Army encampment at Plattsburg. This innovation has been nearly as exasperating to his critics and detractors as that which drove liquors from the mess rooms. The preposterous notion that an enlisted man can or should be anything else, so contrary to the old-established order of things, was "monstrous," even in theory. It could not be otherwise than destructive and damnable in practice. It would break down the walls of official caste, close the chasm between the deck and the officers' bridge, and utterly demoralize the service. Moreover, officers were not trained and commissioned for pedagogy. They should not be required to teach their underlings; the very thought was degrading.

But the Secretary could not be deterred from this most praiseworthy purpose. Despite sneers and detractions he has held steadily to his course. He states the proposition more aptly than I can in a recent interview from which I quote:

They charge that the Navy is going downhill, that enlisted men hate the service, and that my brand of democratization has spelled the demoralization of the service. What is my brand of democratization? I have established schools on board ship, attempting to let every enlisted man have an opportunity for academic and technical education, and I have opened certain doors of promotion to these men. What demoralization has resulted? When I took office only 52 per cent of the men discharged in good standing were reenlisting, while to-day the percentage is 85 per cent. I found a Navy 5,000 short of the number allowed by law. In my three years 6,365 men have been added. There was an average of 1,800 men in prison, while to-day there are less than 700, permitting us to restore two prison ships and two disciplinary barracks to normal uses. During the Taft administration there were over 10,000 desertions. A decrease of over 17 per cent has been achieved already, and every day sees the number lessening. Do these figures indicate discontent, hatred of the service, and destroyed discipline? I stand by my schools and, if necessary, I am willing to fall with them. No man believes more firmly in discipline than I do; never in spoken speech or written have I questioned the absolute necessity in all military service of instant and implicit obedience to a superior. I will have no mercy on insolence or insubordination, be it from seaman to his petty officer or junior lieutenant to his captain, but I do not hold that discipline is dependent upon ignorance or the denial of an American's right to rise as high as his ability will carry him. Time and again it has been declared to me that education does not better fit a man for deck washing or coal heaving, and the contemptuous snobbery of it has never failed to offend. If 85 per cent of discharged men are reenlisting, and if more than 6,000 men that the Navy called for in vain until 1912 have entered the Navy, may it not be that the cause is to be found in a policy that holds out the bright prospects of education and advancement? If sensitive feelings are being hurt by simple recognition of plain Democratic principles, it is a matter for their shame, not mine.

Mr. President, what American putting aside partisanship will challenge the sentiments I have just quoted? What lover of Republican principles will dare affirm their unsoundness? What seaman of the American Navy has repudiated or belittled the Secretary's plans for his well being? On the 13th of last April I accompanied the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to Philadelphia. Upon the train were a splendid young fellow and his wife whom the Senator engaged in conversation. It was disclosed that he was in the naval service; a gunner, off on vacation, and bound with his wife for their little home. The Senator mentioned the name of the Secretary to them and their eyes shone with the light of a new joy. "There," said the young man, "is a Secretary for you—a Secretary of the whole Navy including the boys on the deck and the men at the guns. He is the best we ever had. He wants to give a show to every man under him. We have schools to educate us and enable us to stand for promotion. And he says drink is not any better for officers than for men, so he takes it away from both. And what is more, he sees us when he comes on board ship, and speaks to us, too. And he talks to us about our jobs and takes a human interest in us. They can talk all they please about him in the cabin, but you can rest assured he is all right on the decks and in the quarters." This tells the story.

Mr. President, the innovation, if I may so term it, which the Secretary has made in this matter of education has borne fruit. It finds its counterpart in a section of our military law and in the Japanese Navy. It is an interesting historical circumstance that in 1866 Gen. Lew Wallace, of Indiana, addressed a letter upon this subject to the Committee on Military Affairs—a letter which attracted the attention of Senator Sumner, who took occasion to commend it to the consideration of Congress on the 11th day of April, 1866. I ask to include as a part of my remarks the letter of Gen. Wallace and the remarks of Senator Sumner upon the subject and to insert them at this place in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Navy's school system has been criticized in some quarters as extraneous to and out of place in a great military organization, but it has admittedly helped to attract young men to the service. The papers have contained accounts of such schools established in the German army camps in Europe. That that criticism of the Navy's school system is prejudiced and partisan is evident from the fact that Secretary of War Baker has secured the insertion of the following section, providing for instruction in the Army, in the pending Army bill:

"In addition to military training, soldiers while in the active service shall hereafter be given the opportunity to study and receive instruction upon educational lines of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education, either in agriculture or the mechanic arts. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, and the Secretary of War shall have the power at all times to suspend, increase, or decrease the amount of such instruction offered as may in his judgment be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service of the soldiers."

The Japanese Navy has an elaborate system of instruction aboard ship and at stations for officers and men. The men, among other subjects, are taught "the common sciences," and the following course of "primary instruction: Reading, composition, arithmetic, calculations with the abacus, manner of making the autograph. English vocabulary." The chiefs of the different divisions are directed to "carefully supervise the chiefs of instruction and endeavor to secure the greatest advantage from it."

The education of the soldiers of the Federal Army during the War between the States was a matter close to the heart of able statesmen and brave officers in the field. The present administration of the Navy, in establishing its effective school system is most assuredly vindicated in the effort made by Senator Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, and Maj. Gen. Lew Wallace in seeking to establish a thorough school system in the Army, looking forward to the equipping of the soldiers for their duties as citizens when the war should be ended. The following is an extract from the Congressional Globe of April 11, 1866 (39th Cong., 1st sess., p. 1877):

EDUCATION OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. SUMNER. I send a resolution to the Chair, and ask for its adoption now:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia be instructed to consider the expediency of providing a system of education for the soldiers in the Army of the United States, so that the time not occupied in post or garrison duties may be employed in moral and intellectual improvement, to the end that the Army may be a nursery of officers, and also of citizens."

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I wish to say that my attention has been called to this question by a letter which I saw in the papers this morning from Gen. Lew Wallace, addressed to Hon. John A. Bingham, of the other House. It seems to me that this letter contains some important and practical suggestions, if they can be carried out. I think they must elevate the character of our Army and give to it truly the character of citizen soldiers. I was so much struck with them as I read the letter this morning that I have drawn up this resolution that I might bring the subject in the most formal way before the Committee on Military Affairs of this body.

The resolution was agreed to.

The Daily Morning Chronicle, Washington, of Wednesday, April 11, 1866, contained the following:

"Maj. Gen. Lew Wallace has addressed the following letter on the reorganization of the Army to Judge Bingham. It will be found to contain many suggestions of great importance:

"'WASHINGTON CITY, March 21, 1866.

"'DEAR SIR:

* * * * * * *

"'To extend the system at West Point to the whole Army.

"'That system has three grand features: First, support of the cadet; second, education; third, graduation as officers of the Army. As to the first feature the Government already supports the soldier; there need be no additional cost on that account.

"'As to the second feature, the point is simply, can the hours of service of a private soldier be so divided as to give him time for study and meditation without interfering with his routine of duty? Certainly, except when he is on the march. In post or garrison—his home in time of peace—duty seldom absorbs more than one-third of his hours not devoted to sleep. Hence the proverbial idleness of the military life. My opinion is that the division of the cadet's time, with trifling modifications, is a complete illustration of what ought to be the divisions of time in the Army. It is not more difficult to study and play the soldier than to study and perform a soldier's duty in fact. For those of your committee not familiar with the subject I take the liberty of suggesting that you obtain from the superintendent at West Point a report showing the routine of duty and instruction there, and from the commandant of some well-conducted and amply garrisoned post a report of the routine of duty for his enlisted men; comparison of such data will convince any disinterested person that the difference between the routines amounts to this, and no more; in the academy every hour is appropriated to duty and instruction, while at the post one-third—most frequently not so much—of the working time of the soldier is occupied by duty, and the rest given over to absolute and ruinous idleness. Keeping in mind that what is called duty in the service is performed by the cadet as a part of his necessary instruction, by such a comparison you will come to understand, if you do not now, how simple the task will be to devise a system of instruction, blended with duty, which will have the effect to turn every post into an academy and convert every private soldier into a cadet. Of the details of such a system it is not my purpose now to speak. A board of earnest officers, not idolatrously joined to the old régime, can easily reduce it to form. The branches of instruction will recommend themselves, while the officers and noncommissioned officers of each company should and can discharge the duties of professors and teachers.

"'As to the third feature. After having, in the way proposed, prepared the private soldier, there can be no sound objection to a law by which the officers of the Regular Army shall be drawn from the ranks exclusively, the commissions and warrants being held for that purpose as incentive to the ambition and toil of the enlisted men.

"'The results of the proposed extension are self-apparent. By it you make the service honorable and advantageous to the private soldier, and by holding out inducements, such as education and commission, you will attract to the ranks the flower of our youth, and in that way assure to the Government reliability under all circumstances. By it you will be able speedily to fill your proposed regiments. By it, as a general result, practical military knowledge—not limited to a select caste, few in numbers, and not always faithful—will be scattered broadcast over the country. By it, and by no means least among the consideration, the discharged regular soldier will not be a vagrant or an idler whom society, from fear and distrust, thrusts back to his barracks; on the contrary, his honorable discharge will serve him as a certificate of fitness and ability for any civil pursuit, and make him a welcome addition to every community. By it you will not only get better military service but, as an act of wisest statesmanship, you offer in a constitutional way the coveted opportunity for education to every lad in the land.

"'LEW WALLACE.'"

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Secretary's time it was provided by law that an enlisted man was eligible for promotion to the post of ensign. But it was not until 1910 that any man stood for the examination, when one qualified; in 1911, no one; in 1912, two; or a total of three in four years. Then came the establishment of the ship schools, and the transformation began. In 1913, 5 young men in the ranks became ensigns; in 1914, 6; and in 1915, 6. The examinations were rigid. Let me here quote from the Secretary's statement to the House Committee on Naval Affairs:

I tell you, gentlemen, that a man in the Navy from the enlisted force who stands the examination and secures his appointment is a man. In these three years since we have broadened the educational policy 17 officers have come into the service from the enlisted ranks, as against 3 in the previous four years. I hope this year we will have a dozen, and as the years go by they will increase.

Under a law of the Sixty-third Congress provision was made for appointments to the Naval Academy of 15 enlisted men who could pass the required examinations with records to be approved by their officers. Under that law through the beneficent operation of the Secretary's schools 13 young men were appointed from the decks to Annapolis prior to 1916, where they are doing splendid work, and in the words of the Secretary, "they have the incalculable advantage of at least a year's service on ship where they have had practical training." Surely a system bearing such fruit in the short space of three years is possessed of some superior value.

Mr. President, the law to which I have just referred, enacted by the Sixty-third Congress, and giving a maximum of 15 men the privilege of the Annapolis Academy, was designed originally for 25; but owing to the objection, I think, of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], the number was limited to 15. Twenty-three men have successfully passed the examination for admission into the next class of the Naval Academy, or 8 more than the maximum allowed by the law. The response, therefore, to that opportunity during the first year of the operation of the law is 8 men in excess of the number eligible to admission. An effort will be made, upon the recommendation of the Secretary, so to amend the pending naval bill as to permit the inclusion of the added 8—something which I feel very sure will receive the favorable consideration of the Senate. I have a press notice upon the subject bearing date June 12, and ask permission to insert it in my remarks at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Release for Monday morning, June 12, 1916.]

PRESS NOTICE.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, June 10, 1916.

In the competitive examinations for enlisted men of the Navy for admission to Annapolis 23 enlisted men have qualified, and Secretary Daniels is writing the chairmen of the Senate and House Committees on Naval Affairs requesting that Congress authorize the appointment of all.

Two years ago, upon the recommendation of Secretary Daniels, Congress passed a bill providing for the appointment of 15 enlisted men to the Naval Academy each year. The first examination was held about six weeks after the law was enacted and 5 men qualified. Last year 8 men qualified, and this year 23 men have qualified, but under the law as it now stands only 15 may be admitted. The appointment of the 15 who stood highest will be made immediately, and the Secretary is urging, because of the need of additional officers and because of their excellent record and demonstrated fitness, and inasmuch as the authorized quota was not filled in 1914 and 1915, that Congress pass an act admitting the 8 other candidates who qualified.

The 15 candidates who will be appointed immediately, and their respective addresses, are as follows:

Lisle Judson Maxson, Galesburg, Mich.; Earl Wallace Fife, Venice, Cal.; Earl Le Roy Sackett, Nampa, Idaho; Loyd Kilgore Barry, Smithville, Tex; Henry Nicholas Mergen, Benson, Nebr.; Clarence Floyd Swanson, Denver, Colo.; Raymond Charles Ferris, Newcastle, Del.; Wesley McLaren Hague, San Diego, Cal.; Alfred Antony Wilson, Baltimore, Md.; Ralph Alger Philbrook, Malden, Mass.; John Stanhope Engs, jr., Oakland, Cal.; Frederick William McMahon, New Haven, Conn.; John Gordon Clausing, Rawlings, Wyo.; Joseph Spykstra, jr., Golden, Colo.; Walter Scott Dufton, Oakland, Cal.

The eight other candidates who qualified, and their respective addresses, are as follows:

Edward Hamilton Doolin, Racine, Wis.; George Anthony Russ; Edward William Brady, Portland, Oreg.; Chester Arthur Swafford, Terrell, Tex.; Samuel Wesley Metzger, Pueblo, Colo.; Thomas Wallace Brooks, Putnam, Conn.; Harton Ivey Booker, Greenville, S. C.; Edwin Barton Bobzien, Grants Pass, Oreg.

Mr. THOMAS. More than 20 of these enlisted men stood the examinations of 1916 and have come into the service as officers. Does not this gratifying increase both justify the Secretary's prevision and assure to the Navy that certain increase of officers so much needed and which the Naval Academy can not wholly supply?

The Secretary, with the aid of Congress, has opened other doors of opportunity for the enlisted man. He has appointed and commissioned 15 of them as assistant paymasters in the Navy, first submitting them to examinations. All pay clerks are now by law taken from the ranks, and the Secretary has appointed 187 of them. Those opportunities are the legitimate parents of "efficiency." They make the Naval Service attractive and popular. The Secretary has well and wisely said that—

The bulkhead preventing a young man's advancement must be ended. We will never have an efficient Navy or a great Navy until we make it so that every young man who enlists in it knows that he can be an admiral if he has the brains and the application. We should continue this policy, enlarging opportunities as rapidly as the young men demonstrate their ability and capacity.

Yet the policy encounters the dogged and determined opposition of that caste which, crystallizing in official circles and extending beyond them, would exclude from its sacred inclosures all who do not enter it from above. Opening its doors to the multitude and giving admission to the enlisted man, thus giving him both official and social contact with its aristocratic and exclusive denizens, is profanation. And nothing in this world will evoke more bitterness, more animosity, and more vindictive opposition than assaults on class distinctions. Let us inquire how this spirit has manifested itself against the Secretary. I quote his own words:

I can understand the spirit of honest criticism, but I can not understand the vileness that revels in the slime of a base un-American detraction. In order to enlist the best thought of the Nation in science and invention I asked Thomas A. Edison to serve as the head of an advisory board composed of two representatives from each of the 11 great engineering and scientific societies of the United States. Germany, France, and England place major reliance upon such boards and provide great laboratories for their use. Mr. Edison and his associates serve without salary, paying their own expenses; yet even this devotion has not been able to protect them against slander. It has been charged in open print that Mr. Edison and his associates have no higher motive than a mean hope of selling something to the Government.

It has been said repeatedly that I made an order for officers and men to mess together, and that I gave up the idea only when informed that black men and white might be brought together at the same table. There was never a more infamous falsehood. No such order was ever made or contemplated. Some snapshots were being taken on board ship, and as I had left my hat below, an officer loaned me his cap. I made some laughing remark about its shape, and this has been twisted into personal derision of the naval uniform. Once I spoke at a Young Men's Christian Association meeting of the men, and at its close I was asked to have my picture taken with two of the youngsters. It is this picture that has since been used to show my passion for posing as a friend of the bluejacket.

It is asserted that I have deprived the kin of an enlisted man of the customary death gratuity should he lose his life while on liberty. The law on this subject was passed in 1912, and states specifically that the only cause for withholding payment shall be when death is due to the misconduct of the deceased. We bought 8 searchlights from a German inventor and tendered him a second order of 12 more, at $3,960 apiece, as set down in his bid. The manufacturers did not desire the contract, requesting a new award at $5,200 apiece, but I awarded the contract to the inventor, who by reason of getting it, will be paid $25,000 under his contract with the manufacturers. This transaction constitutes the base of the charge that the United States Navy robbed a stranger and took advantage of him. Nothing seems to be too low, too mean, or too vicious to be said, and the attacks do not stop at me, but soil Navy, Nation, and officials.

I do not care about these pettinesses as far as I personally am concerned, but I do resent the extension of this enmity to others. The people are asked to believe, for instance, that I appointed some inefficient underling to be Chief of the Bureau of Navigation. Victor Blue, the man attacked by inference, has his name in the Naval Register with the notation "advanced for extraordinary heroism during the War with Spain." His daring expeditions to locate the Spanish Fleet at Santiago, however, were no less brilliant than his action in penetrating the Spanish gunboat blockade in an armed ship's boat, meeting Gen. Gomez, and then capturing two Spanish patrol sloops as he ran out of the harbor. He has filled every office on a modern man-of-war, served on Admiral Kempff's staff during the Philippine insurrection, and was a member of the first relief expedition which marched from the sea to Tientsin. After that he was chief of staff of the Pacific Fleet, was appointed by Secretary Meyer to the General Board, and it was there I found him.

I have been criticized also for refusing to permit naval officers to deliver public addresses and otherwise seek to influence legislation. This has been the unbroken policy of the Navy from time immemorial; and President Roosevelt, in 1902, and President Taft, in 1909, reenforced the rule by Executive orders that established dismissal as a penalty for violation. But even while I did not make this regulation, I gave it the usual enforcement. Congress has called before it many officers of the Navy regarded as authorities, and the testimony of these gentlemen has been available to the press, and, to supplement publicity, I have made public the reports of the General Board. No one has been muzzled; simply the law has been enforced that forbids officers from running about the country for purposes of propaganda, a practice in which 99 per cent had no desire to indulge.

Mr. President, I know of no thing or direction in which the Navy is said to be deficient the responsibility for which has not been charged to the present Secretary. The records of the proceedings of our multitudinous leagues reveal this fact on every page. There was a time in the Civil War when Lincoln was damned even in the Halls of Congress for the misfortunes of the Army, for the failures of his commanders, and for the successes of the South. He was showered with every epithet not too scurrilous for public mention, and some even questioned his loyalty to the cause of the Union. But these libelers of the great American live in the memory only through the greatness of the man they so grossly reviled, while the task he undertook and successfully accomplished is a daily reminder of his imperishable renown.

I have no time to notice, much less to comment upon every feature of this campaign of slander. But its underlying cause is strikingly reflected in the incident of the photograph. The Secretary was asked and very naturally and properly consented to the taking of his picture with two enlisted men. The occasion was a meeting of the Young Men's Christian Association which the Secretary had attended and addressed. The picture has been circulated "to show his passion for posing as the friend of the bluejacket!"

This is a serious offense, indeed! What predecessor of Mr. Daniels ever thus condescended to express that friendship? What a shock to the pride of the official caste! How it must inspire that contempt of the bluejacket for his superiors, which familiarity so surely begets. Such an act is demoralizing. It is scandalous. What will the world say as it gazes upon the pleasant features of America's Naval Secretary between the equally pleasant faces of two smiling jackies? Discipline is gone. We may have battleships and submarines in plenty, but no Navy, if this species of fraternization shall go unrebuked. Mr. von Meyer would never have thus offended. The very thought of this perfectly groomed and exquisitely perfumed gentleman touching shoulders with an enlisted man, subjecting his shapely fingers and manicured nails to the contamination of a brawny handshake, is paralyzing. The traditions of the service were respected by such as he, while this vulgar iconoclast brushes them aside with cheerful unconcern. He has the audacity to treat the enlisted man as a fellow human being, even while on duty. Such a policy wrecks the most exacting naval traditions and will bring down the most carefully constructed system of official etiquette.

The Saturday Evening Post in its issue of June 5 contains a most interesting article from the pen of Mr. Henry Merrill Hitchcock, recently an ensign in the service. It is entitled "Men Wanted for the United States Navy," and everyone should read it. He endeavors to tell us why, although our ships are unsurpassed, the service is not as popular nor as complete as it should be and must become if we are to have a Navy that is genuinely American. Mr. Hitchcock says that it was American in the days of Stephen Decatur, but that, instead of glorying in the fact, it afterwards began to lose touch with the country it belongs to and has made itself into an imitation British institution by aping the aristocratic and ceremonious characteristics peculiar to it, thus steering "straight for trouble." He illustrates the result with these incidents:

> Some years ago a certain officer in the United States Navy was captain and manager of his ship's baseball team. His pitcher was a youngster of 19, a big, rawboned, red-haired youth, with a world of speed, an untamed curve ball, and the rating of an ordinary seaman.
> One day while the ship was lying in the navy yard the team played a game in which, after going along beautifully for seven innings, this young pitcher made a woeful error in the eighth and lost his game.
> After the game the young pitcher and the young officer, both still in baseball uniforms, walked back to the ship together, the young officer talking to the enlisted man and trying to hearten him up. As they came over the gangway of the ship and the young ordinary seaman turned to go forward the young officer gave him an encouraging farewell pat on the shoulder and himself went down to his stateroom.
> But that little gesture had been witnessed by a horrified group of officers on the quarter-deck. The young officer was just pulling his shirt over his head when he heard a preemptory knock on his stateroom door. He opened it and found himself face to face with an older officer, who proceeded without loss of time to read him an impassioned discourse on the unspeakable, the heinous crime he had committed in putting his hands on an enlisted man.
> Perhaps you think that was an extreme instance of its kind; but if it was, it was so because very few graduates of the Naval Academy would be capable of committing the terrible "faux pas" which called forth such unmeasured condemnation and not because the spirit that prompted the ensuing curtain lecture is rare.
> Another time a young officer just out of the Naval Academy was put to standing watch on a battleship. With the officer on deck, on watch there also stands watch an enlisted man, the quartermaster, whose duties in port may be roughly described as those of general assistant to the officer of the deck. A capable and experienced quartermaster is a very valuable asset to a watch officer, particularly to a young one.
> This particular youngster was fortunate enough to have an unusually capable and trustworthy quartermaster on watch with him; and being himself intelligent enough to recognize his own inexperience, and not too much impressed with his own importance to be capable of learning from a subordinate, he very soon found that he could safely turn to the quartermaster for advice in any small emergency with great benefit to all concerned.
> Presently, however, the executive officer of that ship—that is to say, the second in command—came up on deck and observed the young watch officer in consultation with his trusty assistant. He promptly called the young officer to him and brought to his attention in forcible language the terrible injury to "discipline" and the derogation suffered by the dignity of the officer of the deck when that official was to be seen in public conversation with an enlisted man. In concluding his article, Mr. Hitchcock says:
> "That is the kind of shop the Navy is in which to work. It is rather hard to imagine that so long as it remains that kind of shop, it is going to prove tremendously attractive to young Americans."

Such incidents are a libel upon democracy. The officers responsible for them dishonor the uniform of the service they wear. And it is not at all surprising that men capable of such wholly un-American conduct should bitterly resent the democracy of a Secretary who would stand between two ordinary seamen and be photographed with them. For they see in the act the beginning of the end of their miserable so-called system of "discipline"; a system which places a humiliating barrier between the cabin and the deck, exalting the inmates of the one to a place but little below the angels and depressing the occupants of the other to the level of the brute. Man and superman there may be, but in the hour of crisis the superman not only must direct the fire but man the guns as well. And Democracy militant must needs be democracy prevalent at sea as upon land. The Navy must have an esprit du corps large enough and liberal enough to comprise men as well as officers, or we may never hope for an effective and thoroughly dependable naval force.

Some weeks ago I read a most interesting description of the French Army, the greatest, because the most democratic, military organization on earth. The officers speak to their men and regard them as their "children." The men speak to their officers and regard them as "my commander." Off duty they commingle and converse together. On duty they frequently break their bread at the same camp table. Between commander and subordinate officer there is social equality and freedom of intercourse. These human relations do not impair discipline; on the contrary, they stimulate it. Between the man who orders and the man who obeys runs the warm current of affection, born of the principle of equality. And man follows officer, as officer leads man, into the jaws of death when country demands it, with a heroism and devotion having no parallel in the awful theater of the world's greatest war. Not until this principle shall have been crystallized into America's military and naval system, not until the social void which yawns between the officer and the private shall have been obliterated, not until these come together in the true spirit of friendly intercourse and companionship, not until the soldier becomes the object of the officer's personal solicitude, and the officer is the recipient of the soldier's unreserved confidence and affection, will we have a genuine Army and Navy—the true reflection of American policies and the fit defenders of American democracy. And not until the iron rules of caste, framed outside the law and wholly foreign to equality before the law, the parasite growth of imitation, shall have been swept aside will we have a maximum of American soldiers or seamen, however we may legislate or whatever inducements we may offer to enlistments.

This country is a democracy, but its Army and its Navy are not democratic. What father, under prevailing Army and Navy regulations and discipline, wants to see his boy enlist as a private in either? What young American of spirit and character will under existing conditions barter his spirit of independence and his sense of equality for a uniform which advertises his loss of both? Why do desertions so largely disfigure the records of both? One answer can be found in the distance which separates the man from the officer, albeit between them there may be perfect equality of birth, of station, of accomplishments, and of intellectual capacity. The Secretary of the Navy, conscious of this most obvious fact, and anxious to minimize, if not to remove it entirely, has formulated a wise and necessary policy, and then proceeded to make it effective. And he has succeeded well. No injury has come either to men or to material. Those in command have been neither humbled nor shorn of authority. Desertions have decreased materially. The man below may now rise to the level of the man above. The man above will ere long extend the hand of aid and of friendship to the man below, and both will attain a higher and yet higher grade of efficiency through the natural respect and confidence thus engendered. The spirit of esteem and of emulation will supplant the spirit of discontent and the sense of injustice, and the personnel of the Navy, both officers and men, will make it invincible.

It is due to many officers of the American Navy, whose numbers are happily increasing, to say that they have no sympathy with, nor any wish to perpetuate, the caste system in the Navy. They realize that it is wholly alien to democracy; that it is a parasite of foreign growth; that it must be eliminated from the service. They have welcomed the reforms which the Secretary has initiated. They are giving him every support and every encouragement. These splendid Americans need no teacher to instruct them regarding the requirements for enlisting freemen in the public service and holding them to its ideals while discharging its duties. They know that preparation, in its last and best analysis, rests upon the stout heart, the quick eye, the skillful hand, and the impassioned loyalty of the private in the ranks. They constitute the Secretary's most powerful support, for they strive to make his efforts effectual.

Armor plate is perhaps the most expensive component of the modern battleship. This is so because the material is the result of several and difficult processes, and also because its production in the United States is limited to three concerns, nominally competitive, but practically a unit. Nitrates are the principal component of gunpowder, the natural deposit of which Chile has the monopoly; and the patents for its production are in private control. The stupendous profits in armor-plate manufacture largely explain the unbalanced character of our naval equipment and the disproportion between armored vessels and other craft.

A congressional investigation in 1894 revealed the rottenness of armor-plate conditions in the United States. Contractors with the Government for armor plate, and they were the same concerns that now monopolize the product, were convicted out of their own mouths, not only of furnishing an inferior and practically useless article to the Government, but also of selling their wares to foreign countries for an average of about half its cost to the United States. What better evidence of their extortionate profit is needed?

Nitrates have, due to increasing foreign demand, risen enormously in value, thus adding to our cost of powder, and compelling us to seek the only alternative source of supply. The Secretary of the Navy, in common with many Senators and Representatives of both the great parties, favors the construction of a Government plant for supplying itself with armor plate, and of a hydroelectro plant for the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen. Both propositions have found expression in the Senate bills providing for their establishment, both have passed in the House, as well, and both will soon be enacted into law. These have very naturally aroused the wrathful opposition of those great private interests, hitherto enjoying a monopoly of the one and looking forward to the enjoyment of an equally valuable monopoly of the other. This opposition has found expression through all the avenues so readily commanded by wealth and power, and has been aimed alike at Cabinet and Congress. The Secretary of the Navy, having with characteristic candor warmly advocated the equipment of these public institutions, and Congress having signified its approval of his views, other extensive manufacturers of other indispensable War and Navy matériel have very naturally, and very properly, apprehended similar invasions of their specialized spheres of public supply, and they, too, are shouting protests of disapproval against this last and, to them, most dangerous manifestation of "socialistic activity." In their view, Mr. Daniels, though by no means the only, is the most conspicuous sinner against the laws and the Constitution—therefore their denunciation.

When Demetrius, the silversmith, who made shrines for Diana, heard Paul persuade the people to turn away from gods which were made with human hands he called his fellow workmen together and said to them: "Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth." And he cunningly concealed the real danger which he feared by reminding them that the temple of the great goddess Diana would be despised and her magnificence destroyed by the teachings of the apostle. Wherefore they were filled with wrath and cried out, saying, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." And the hands and voices of the city were lifted against him.

It is not the real friends of the Navy nor its well-being which protests the Secretary's handiwork here, but the image makers and those of other craft who profit by the old régime—the inner circle of the select and the rigid conservatism which regards change as the synonym of destruction. These would stay his hand by crying out against him in the name of the Navy and undo his work by arousing the angry clamors of the multitude. But the Secretary, serene and self-contained, will persevere in the good work unto the very end, well knowing that it is even now receiving the sanction as it will hereafter command the generous approval of a wise and discriminating public opinion. The day of the purveyor for profit in war matériel has passed its zenith. The sun will soon cast its shadow to the eastward, surely lengthening as the hours go by. The dawn of a better day for the soldier and the seaman is at hand. As in France, officer and man will meet on common ground, each knowing and respecting his position, both stirred by the same impulses of duty and devotion to the Republic.

I shall not recount the many details of improvement which have come to the Navy under its present vigorous and efficient administration. That has been done, and by more competent hands than mine. These will continue so long as the Secretary remains in charge of its vast affairs. I am largely concerned with that indefensible and un-American propaganda of detraction and contumely launched against a worthy public servant, intent upon his duty and its effective discharge, a propaganda prompted partly by ignorance but in larger degree by unworthy and ignoble motives.

We have a great Navy; we shall have a greater one, unless all the signs of the times are meaningless; and it will be evolved on orderly, balanced, and efficient lines. It will be built not for conquest but for security. Its material structure, its human equipment, and its correlated portions will unite to make it the most efficient weapon of defense ever designed and constructed for the protection of an independent people. This end will be ordained and this purpose accomplished largely through the agency of Josephus Daniels and the subordinates now so cheerfully and so loyally sustaining him.

CONSTRUCTION OF BATTLESHIPS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is not here at this moment, and, as there is no morning business, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. President, yesterday I asked unanimous consent for the publication in the RECORD of the resolution I introduced on July 16, 1912, together with an article by Commander W. A. Moffett relating to the construction of 60,000-ton battleships. As Commander Moffett's article contained an illustration, the Senate referred all the matter to the Committee on Printing. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], chairman of that committee, reported a resolution for the printing of this manuscript as a Senate document, which was adopted.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution in question and the article by Commander Moffett, without the illustration, may be printed in the RECORD in large type. I think the article will be more accessible to Senators in that way than in any other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. It is to be printed without the illustration?

Mr. TILLMAN. There are no illustrations to go in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. All right, Mr. President.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION SUBMITTED BY SENATOR TILLMAN INSTRUCTING THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS TO INVESTIGATE AND REPORT TO THE SENATE AS TO THE SIZE OF BATTLESHIPS AND CRUISERS.

[Senate resolution 361, 62d Cong., 2d sess.]

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 16, 1912.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be, and it is hereby, instructed to investigate and report to the Senate what is the maximum size of ship, whether battleship or cruiser; the maximum thickness of armor that such ship can safely carry; the maximum size of gun; the maximum speed and the maximum desirable radius of action of such vessel that can safely be built so as to navigate the ocean and enter the first-class harbors of the world; how much draft can such vessel carry in order to enter the existing dry docks in this country for repairs, and safely pass through the Panama Canal; the object being to find out from authentic and reliable official sources the maximum size and maximum draft, the maximum armament, and the maximum thickness of armor to make the very best battleship or cruiser that the world has ever seen or will ever see; to have this country own the greatest marine engine of war ever constructed or ever to be constructed under known conditions; and to report whether one such overpowering vessel would not in its judgment be better for this country to build than to continue by increasing taxation to spend the millions and millions of dollars now in prospect in the race for naval supremacy. Let such vessel be named the Terror, and become the peacemaker of the world. Let us find out just how far we can go with any degree of safety and go there at once. Let us leave some money in the Treasury for other more necessary and useful expenditures, such as good roads, controlling the floods in the Mississippi, draining swamp land in the South, and irrigating the arid land in the West."

"BUILD THE LIMIT."

[By Commander W. A. Moffett, United States Navy.]

"The history of modern battleship construction shows that their displacement has steadily increased. Our first battleship, represented by the Oregon, displaced 10,300 tons; the next, the Kentucky class, 11,500; the Maine class, 12,500; the Georgia class, 14,900; the Connecticut class, 16,000, etc., increasing at an average rate of about 1,000 tons a year.

"There has been constant endeavor to keep the displacement down, for obvious reasons, cost principally, of the individual ship; docking facilities, draft of harbors, as well as supposed, if imaginary, tactical advantages. The designers of each nation strive, on a given displacement, to outstrip all others in turning out the best all-round ship, but the inexorable limit of displacement has invariably resulted in compromises, each nation turning out what is considered best, sacrificing one element to another, speed to guns, endurance, armor protection, etc.

"There were, and are, schools in our own Navy as well as in others that opposed increasing displacement, but each year has seen displacement steadily increasing, none the less. The first radical increase came with the Dreadnought from 16,000 to 20,000 tons. Up to this time the constructors of the world, including our own, fondly imagined that the standard type of battleship had been reached in a ship of about 16,000 tons, 18 knots speed, main battery of four 12-inch guns, in two center-line turrets, intermediate battery of 6-inch guns, and 3-inch guns for torpedo defense, represented by our Connecticut. They were aroused from their false security by the thinking, practical men of the British Navy, who brought forward the epoch-making Dreadnought, making a bold increase of 4,000 tons in displacement and 2 knots in speed. Our own Navy had an inspiration about this time and our designers gave us the South Carolina class, all big-gun ships and turrets on midship line—notable above all else for this last-named feature, which was ultimately followed by all other designers.

"The Dreadnought immediately scrapped all other battleships, in the British as well as in all other navies. This is where Great Britain's rivals, especially Germany, had their great opportunity. They should have promptly scrapped their old ships and spent all their available money for battleships that would outbuild the Dreadnought. We did, in a half-hearted way, and have continued to do so since, but not boldly. We are, and have been, too conservative. We have, since the Dreadnought, and like all other nations, steadily increased the displacement, and in the last few years have actually had the courage to go beyond Great Britain in displacement, so that we have the Pennsylvania class, actually larger by 4,000 tons than the latest ship by the British, and it is reported in the newspapers that the General Board has even recommended ships as large as 36,000 tons.

"England's reasons for not wishing to increase the displacement of her battleships beyond what it is are obvious enough. She had a bad scare after the Dreadnought's design became public, and found Germany laying down many ships of equal and larger displacement, and she lost no time in outbuilding her in numbers in these then large ships. She does not want this experience duplicated. She has the largest navy in the world, and realizes that it is a practicable impossibility for any other nation to catch up with her as long as they confine themselves to ships of the same size as her own.

"On account of cost, docking, draft of harbors, and other supposed good reasons, as well as the long-exploded and farmer-like argument of 'too many eggs in one basket,' the designers of all navies have attempted to keep down the displacement and to crowd into the limited displacement the maximum of elements that go to make an efficient battleship. But one element or another has always had to be sacrificed, and to date this has been principally speed. As a rule the caliber of the guns of the main battery, especially since the all-big-gun battleship idea, has been near the limit of the mechanical arts at the time; also the amount of armor protection has not been sacrificed. The consumption of displacement for speed increased in such a rapid ratio that designers all gave pause and stopped near 21 or 22 knots. However, the yearning to get speed would not down and resulted in the battle cruiser, where armor and the number of guns were sacrificed to speed. But the inexorable demand for the battleship possessing all desirable elements steadily increases, resulting in increased displacement, except in the case of Great Britain, whose reasons against it are well taken—from her standpoint.

"Why not take a lesson from history and frankly decide what we want, what characteristics a battleship should have, what speed, endurance, battery, armor, etc., it should have, and then build it regardless of displacement? Is it not fair to assume, nay, is it not certain, that if battleships' displacement has increased from 10,000 tons in 1896 to 32,000 tons in 1916 that it will continue to do so until the limit is reached? Why not go the limit at once? By so doing we scrap the battleships of every navy in the world, and by spending the money we would spend on smaller ships we build a smaller number of vessels, but the most powerful fleet in the world.

"Other navies would have to follow our example and build ships like ours or give up the competition. We could stand the cost better than any other nation. It is therefore an advantage to us to make navies cost as much as possible. We have more money than any other nation and will have more, comparatively, at the close of the war, when most of them will be bankrupt. It is therefore to our advantage to make individual ships cost more.

"The limit for us in the size of battleships is the Panama Canal locks. It is also the limit for any power that might go to war against us, for none would sacrifice the advantage of being able to send its fleet through the canal. The limit, therefore, of displacement for our battleships is within 1,000 feet in length and 110 feet in beam, the dimensions of the Panama Canal locks. Let us therefore go the limit at once, while we have the opportunity to do it, ahead of all our rivals, and build the limit at the same time in everything; that is to say, in speed, caliber of guns, endurance, fuel, ammunition, etc.

"In regard to speed, some may urge that the highest practicable speed is unnecessarily high. Not long ago 16 knots in battleships was considered ample and 26 knots in destroyers. Now 21 knots is the minimum for battleships and 30 knots for destroyers and battle cruisers. Why not go as high as the mechanical arts will permit?

"Go the limit, too, in caliber of guns. It is said, 'Build a gun no larger in caliber than necessary.' But who can say what is 'necessary'? Only a few years ago the 12-inch gun was amply 'necessary' in the opinion of most people. To-day the 15-inch gun does not seem to be large enough, and even we are contemplating putting 16-inch guns on our battleships. The newspapers report 17-inch guns going on German ships. Fourteen or sixteen inch guns may be as large as 'necessary,' but who, being engaged with an enemy equal in other respects, would not prefer to have a battery with larger caliber than one's adversary? And if you had also superior speed, how much greater the advantage.

"One great but seldom mentioned advantage of the large ship, as compared with the smaller, is as a gun platform, especially at high speed and in a rough sea. At 18 knots in a moderate sea the 16,000-ton ship can hardly fire her turret guns, and she rolls and pitches to such an extent that her chances of hitting are small. The 27,000-ton ship is, under the same conditions and even at higher speed, comparatively steady, and her guns can be fired more effectively. But the 60,000-ton ship will hardly know she is at sea, and while her 27,000-ton rivals are trying to get the range and fire on the roll she will be as steady as a church and as regularly making salvo hits.

"Finally, but for us of greatest importance, the political side. The average American, the man in the street, may be ignorant of naval affairs, but one thing every American wants and knows he wants; that is, to see his country first. For years he has believed she was first in everything. Recently he has had a rude awakening, at least as far as the Navy is concerned. But still, each in his heart feels that our Navy should be first and hopes that in some way it may be made so.

"There is but one way, and that is by building the limit in size of battleships. Build a smaller number if Congress will not give us what the Navy asks for—even one-half the number as would be built of 32,000 or 36,000 tons. In this way we will scrap England's Navy, as well as all others. In no other way can we ever hope to have the first navy in the world—in no other way can we hope to overtake Great Britain. Money is force if properly and wisely used. We have more money than any other nation, and therefore more force. Let us use it. We can afford it. No other nation can.

"Build the limit in displacement, in speed, in caliber of guns, with proper proportion of fuel and ammunition endurance, etc., and we will have, indeed, the first real superdreadnaught, of approximately the following dimensions:

Length over all	feet	995
Length between perpendiculars	do	975
Beam	do	105
Draft	do	32
Speed, maximum	knots	35–36
Endurance at maximum speed	hours	72
Estimated horsepower		250,000
Total displacement	tons	60,000

"Battery:

Ten 18-inch B. L. R.
Sixteen 6-inch R. F. G.
Antiaircraft guns.
Antisubmarine guns.
Saluting battery, etc.
Four submerged torpedo tubes.

"Can anyone doubt that a fleet of such ships would incomparably better defend our coast and more quickly seek out and smash the enemy's fleet than any number of smaller ships?"

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is on page 32, beginning in line 4, after the words "And provided further," to strike out down to and including the words "vehicle route," in line 9, and to insert certain words printed in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to speak upon this matter and they are not in the Chamber. I suppose they did not think the speech of the Senator from Colorado would be concluded so quickly. I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that they may be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Husting	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	James	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Johnson, Me.	Oliver	Smoot
Broussard	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sterling
Bryan	Jones	Phelan	Swanson
Clapp	Kern	Pittman	Thompson
Culberson	La Follette	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Walsh
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth	Warren
Gore	McLean	Sheppard	Weeks
Harding	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Williams
Hardwick	Martine, N. J.	Shields	Works
Hollis	Myers	Simmons

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on important public business.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is detained from the Senate by reason of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. KERN. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, beginning with line 4, after the words "And provided further," the committee proposes to strike out the words—

That no part of the money herein appropriated for Rural Delivery Service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

And to insert:

That rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

Hereafter all rural mail-delivery routes shall be divided into two classes, to be known as—

Standard horse-drawn vehicle routes, which shall be 24 miles in length, and

Standard motor-vehicle routes, which shall be 50 miles in length, and shall only be established upon certificate of the duly qualified county road officials that the character of the roads proposed to be used, as well as climatic conditions, will warrant regular and practically uninterrupted service throughout the year.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the establishment of horse-drawn vehicle routes of less length than the standard of 24 miles: Provided, That in extraordinary cases, in order to render more complete service, it should be necessary to do so, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to increase the length of routes not to exceed 50 per cent above the standards herein prescribed; and in such cases the compensation of the carrier on such route shall be increased above the maximum pay heretofore fixed by law for rural carriers at the rate of $24 per annum for each mile of said routes in excess of 30 miles for horse-drawn vehicle routes, and any major fraction of a mile shall be counted as a mile: Provided further, That carriers in rural mail-delivery service shall furnish and maintain at their own expense all necessary vehicle equipment for prompt handling of the mail: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed, and no order shall be issued, to prevent the use of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow and pay additional compensation to rural letter carriers who are required to carry pouch mail to intermediate post-offices or for intersecting loop routes in all cases where it appears that the carriage of such pouches increases the expense of the equipment required by the carrier or materially increases the amount of labor performed by him, such compensation not to exceed the sum of $12 per annum for each mile such carrier is required to carry such pouch or pouches.

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to reorganize and readjust existing rural mail-delivery service where necessary to conform to the standards herein prescribed: Provided, That in making appointments of rural carriers for service on new routes which may be created by the reorganization herein ordered preference shall be given to carriers who were formerly employed in Rural Delivery Service and who were separated therefrom on or after June 30, 1915, by reason of any previous reorganization of the service and without charges against them: And provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations already made and still available and unexpended for Rural Free Delivery Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, to all letter carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, their executors or administrators, the difference between what they received for their said services and the amount that would have been paid to them in accordance with the proviso contained in joint resolution making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 4, 1915.

Mr. BRYAN. The last proviso is not involved now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is all one amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. From line 5, on page 34.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Florida reserved a point of order on the proviso.

Mr. BRYAN. The Chair ruled yesterday that that part of it would not be involved on the first vote to be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Florida whether it is not a fact that the whole text constitutes one amendment, notwithstanding?

Mr. BRYAN. I do not think so. In order to obviate that, then, Mr. President, I raise the point of order on the matter, beginning with the proviso on line 5, page 34.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, for the convenience of the Senate and to expedite matters, I desire to ask unanimous consent that we dispose of the amendment, except the part referred to by the Senator from Florida. That was practically what we agreed upon yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to inquire whether that would not be a division of the question?

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, that is a division of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the question be considered as divided, that part of it prior to the proviso on line 5, page 34, being one question, and that commencing with the words "And provided further," on line 5, page 34, being the other question. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, Mr. President, I must raise the point of order on the proviso. I rely on the third and fourth paragraphs of Rule XVI of the Senate. The third paragraph provides that—

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received.

This portion of the committee amendment it seems to me is without question undoubtedly covered by that paragraph. It does not relate in any degree to the text of the House bill. This is an attempt to require the Postmaster General to make a payment for what it is claimed is a moral obligation of the Post Office Department. Paragraph 3 of Rule XVI proceeds:

Nor shall any amendment to any item or clause of such bill be received which does not directly relate thereto.

Passing from paragraph 3 to paragraph 4, paragraph 4 provides in substance that no amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be considered.

This portion of the committee amendment refers to the claims of individual rural-mail carriers against the Government of the United States. In the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, the Postmaster General was authorized to pay not exceeding $1,200 to each carrier. He paid, as he had a right to do under that provision, less than $1,200 to some carriers. It is now attempted by this amendment to impose these private claims upon this appropriation bill. Of course, that can be done if it is to carry out the provisions of an existing law; but there is no existing law requiring that payment and no report of a committee; and no estimate of the head of a department could make this amendment in order if it is objected to under the fourth paragraph of Rule XVI of the Senate Rules. So, under both paragraphs, this amendment is clearly vulnerable.

Mr. President, I raised this same objection when the last Post Office appropriation bill was being considered, and the point of order was sustained by the Vice President. I do not suppose that the committee or members of the committee will argue here this morning that the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the committee thinks that the point of order raised by the Senator from Florida is not good, on three grounds. The provision against which the Senator directs his point of order is part of the committee amendment to the paragraph beginning on line 21, page 31, which provides for the pay of rural carriers and substitutes for rural carriers, their annual leave, and so forth, and povides the round sum of $53,000,000 for that pay.

In connection with that proposition, the House of Representatives undertook to change, and did change, existing law by the insertion of the paragraph which your committee struck out, beginning on line 4, on page 32, as follows:

That no part of the money herein appropriated for rural-delivery service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

The Senate committee, striking out the provision of the House bill, undertook to deal with the subject matter, and in dealing with the subject matter did so under the unbroken practice of this body, on the theory and with the idea that we had full liberty to deal with it in any way that the Senate and its committee thought best; that the subject matter being open, being before the Senate because of the text of the House bill to which the Senate rule could not be applied, the Senate had full freedom of action in dealing with the entire question. On yesterday, as I understand, that view was substantially sustained in this body, although no direct ruling was made by the Vice President on the question, the Senator from Florida finally withdrawing his point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia does not want to put me in that attitude. I withdrew the point of order for this reason——

Mr. HARDWICK. Just a moment, and I will yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HARDWICK. Not just for the present. I will yield to the Senator in one minute. I do not want to put the Senator from Florida in any attitude that is not right. The Senator from Florida on yesterday urged the view which he has now urged; but finally, after argument and after the statement of the Vice President that it was impossible for him to construe this language and to decide whether or not it was a change in existing law, Senators disagreeing on that question, he felt it to be his duty to submit the question to the Senate, the Senator from Florida finally did withdraw the point of order. Now, I yield to the Senator from Florida. If I have misstated his position, I am sorry.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the fact. I did not withdraw the point of order because I did not think the point of order was good, but I withdrew the point of order because if the Senate wanted to insert the matter the Senate could do it, and the Senate by the same vote could decline to adopt the committee amendment as in voting on the point of order.

Another reason, I am frank to say, is that very frequently, in voting on the question of whether or not a point of order is germane, Senators upon coming into the Senate vote their convictions on the proposition involved instead of on the rules of the Senate; and I did not want to have set another precedent of that kind.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I understood that was the Senator's motive, and I did not want to represent it or him incorrectly. I am sorry if I conveyed that impression even to him; but the fact is that the Senator, after making the point of order on the remainder of the paragraph, thought it wisest to withdraw it.

The committee insists to-day, just as it did yesterday to the Vice President, that the House, having taken this matter up and having eliminated it from the operations of Rule XVI, any substitute that the Senate committee or the Senate itself may care to adopt is before this body for full, unimpeded action by the Senate. It would be preposterous, I think, to say that we are bound to the mere limits of the exact proposition submitted by the House, and that we can only say "yes" or "no" to the exact and precise proposition submitted by the House of Representatives. We therefore urge that view against the point of order submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The Senator from Florida invokes section 3 and section 4 of Rule XVI against this particular part of the amendment, the part beginning with line 5 on page 34. First, the Senator from Florida says it is obnoxious to the rule, because it is general legislation in connection with an appropriation bill; and, second, the Senator from Florida says that it is obnoxious to section 4 of the rule, because it provides for the payment of a private claim on a general appropriation bill. In addition to the response already made the committee submits the following as an answer to the argument of the Senator from Florida: In the first place, the proposition contained in the language against which the Senator from Florida makes his point of order is not new legislation; on the contrary, it is legislation which has been twice passed by the Congress of the United States, once under the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and, second, under the joint resolution making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916. In other words, we say that we have inserted the provisions of two recent acts of Congress, and that, instead of being in violation of existing law, we have inserted the provisions of existing law.

We contend, too, Mr. President, that it is in no sense a private claim; that this provision simply provides for the payment of salaries due public officers for public services—not claims they have, but amounts due them under the plain, express provisions of existing law.

The Senator from Florida says that a year ago this point of order was sustained. It was; I have the RECORD before me, and the RECORD discloses a remarkable state of facts. This point of order was sustained then on a thorough misapprehension of what the facts were about this matter. Of course I do not think it was the fault of the Senator from Florida any more than it was the fault of one or two other Senators who participated in the debate.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 24, 1915, shows that the Senator from Florida made this precise point of order, and that he suggested that it involve an additional appropriation of $3,000,000, or, at any rate, would create a deficit, as he put it—and it amounts to the same thing—of $3,000,000 in the operations of the Post Office Department. That was pretty generally consented to by several Senators who participated in the debate. For instance, the Vice President said—I will read to you just the conclusion—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let us understand where we are. Will this amendment increase the appropriation?
Mr. BRYAN. It will.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will increase it $3,000,000.

My colleague, it will be seen, interjected a statement that it would increase the appropriation by $3,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has it been estimated for? [A pause.]

Evidently, no reply being made, the Chair then said:

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The point I make is that the Chair acted a year ago under a misapprehension of what the facts were. This amendment involves no additional appropriation; it involves no additional expenditure.

In section 211 of the Revised Statutes, codified in the Postal Laws and Regulations, this provision is contained:

SEC. 211. * * * The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury. * * *

2. * * * And it shall be the duty of the several accounting officers of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of all claims under appropriations, the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of said section (act June 20, 1874, supra), that may be brought before them within a period of five years. *

The fact is, as your committee discovered upon inquiry from the auditor for the department, that this fund—the million and a half that it would require, in round numbers, to pay this money already appropriated by two acts of Congress—is still in the Treasury to the credit of the Post Office Department and to the credit of this particular fund. It will involve no appropriation whatever, and therefore the theory on which the Vice President sustained the point of order a year ago is wrong in point of fact. We are simply reappropriating, according to existing law and the precise terms of existing law, money already in the Treasury and to the credit of this fund. It will involve neither a deficit nor an additional appropriation. The money is already there; and it is apparent, from even a casual examination of the RECORD, that the Vice President a year ago, in sustaining the point of order, did so on the ground that it was an increase of appropriation for which no estimate had been made.

We say on all three grounds that the point of order of the Senator from Florida is not good:

First, that the House of Representatives, having undertaken to deal with this matter in a legislative way, the Senate has a full, free right to deal with this same question and the various branches of it in whatever way seems best to the Senate, and that the limitations under which it can deal with it are not such as are fixed by the ordinary rules of the Senate, because to the text of the House bill the ordinary rules of the Senate can not be applied.

We say, in the second place, that instead of its being in violation of existing law or instead of its being the enactment of a general law, it is simply the carrying out of existing law as twice passed by this Congress.

We say, in the third place, that there is no increase of appropriation; that the money is there in the Treasury, unexpended, to the credit of this particular fund.

We believe that for all these reasons the point of order urged by the Senator from Florida is not good.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator know when the appropriation of which he speaks was made?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir; June 30, 1915.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then in 1916, as the Senator remembers, a resolution was passed on the same subject; but it was originally appropriated by the Post Office appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless the appropriation was extended by legislation there is no available money in the Treasury of the United States to pay rural carriers, as the appropriation lapsed on June 30, 1915.

Mr. HARDWICK. It will be June 30, 1917, before the two years are up.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not a question of two years; it is a question of each fiscal year.

Mr. HARDWICK. Was the Senator in the Chamber just now when I read from the Revised Statutes on that question? For two years it remains in the Treasury subject to these appropriations made and for five years subject to reappropriation for this very purpose. Was the Senator here when I read section 211 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not hear the Senator read the Revised Statutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator, then, if he has any doubt on this question, read that section? That is what we base our contention on. Besides, the information of the auditor for the department is that the money is there to the credit of this particular fund. We inquired into that.

Mr. SMOOT. My thought was this: Appropriations are generally made for the fiscal years ending June 30.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And if, in the appropriation bill, it is not specifically stated that hereafter an appropriation is made it is not a permanent appropriation and lapses at the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not a permanent appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. What I wanted to know of the Senator was whether this particular appropriation stated that hereafter the amount named would be appropriated for this purpose, or was it a simple appropriation for the fiscal year of June 30, 1915?

Mr. HARDWICK. Just an appropriation for the pay of the carriers for that fiscal year. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the language in section 211 of the Revised Statutes:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause all unexpended balances of appropriations which shall have remained upon the books of the Treasury for two fiscal years to be carried to the surplus fund and covered into the Treasury, * * * and it shall be the duty of the several accounting officers of the Treasury to continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of all claims under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund under the provisions of said section that may be brought before them within a period of five years.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fully aware of that act, Mr. President; but this is what I was calling attention to: If the appropriation was made for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, the Auditor of the Treasury can not pay out any part of that money now after June 30, 1915, without a special act of Congress. Therefore I wanted the Senator to be positive as to whether it was an appropriation made after June 30, 1915.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me read section 210, and see if that throws any additional light on the question. Section 210 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year—

That is what the Senator has in mind?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK (reading)—

shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year.

That is the provision on which we rely. We say we are appropriating money not for this year but for that very year—that fiscal year—for which the act of Congress referred to made provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is wrong in that conclusion. I have been on the Appropriations Committee for a good many years, and I know when an appropriation is made, for instance, for a State fish hatchery, we will say, and is made for the fiscal year only, it sometimes happens that the Government of the United States can not secure the title to the land, and the end of the fiscal year passes without the expenditure of the money or without a contract being entered into for the purchase of land. Now, that appropriation lapses after June 30 of that year. It can not be utilized in any way in the future unless by a special act of Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, now, let us see.

Mr. SMOOT. I am positive of it, as I have had a similar case.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me for just a minute?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am yielding to him, but I want to interrupt him for just a minute.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would it not be true, however—the language of both of the sections of the Revised Statutes suggests such an idea, to my mind, and certainly the auditor for the department thinks the money is there to the credit of this fund and not in the General Treasury balance, because he so informed the committee—would it not be true, however, that for the precise purposes of the act, for the payment of the carriers who served during that very fiscal year for which provision was made in the act to which I refer, up to the period of time stated in these two sections that money would be available?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, I can not say until I look at the original act; but if the appropriation was made directly for the purpose named and was for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and the amount of money had not been paid out before the close of that fiscal year, and the appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1916, did not reenact the appropriation, then I say that it would be impossible for the auditor to pay out the money for any purpose without further legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, now, let us see. It might be without authority from Congress; but the giving of such authority would not amount to a new appropriation, because under the two sections of the Revised Statutes to which I direct the attention of the Chair and of the Senate it is kept a certain length of time for the very purpose of meeting claims that are embraced within the very letter and terms of the laws; and that is what has been done in this case.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the Senator must admit that, even under that statute, the money, if it was appropriated for any specific year without the word "hereafter" being used in the original appropriation, could not be paid out by the auditor unless there was a specific item in an appropriation bill carrying that same amount.

Mr. HARDWICK. After all, that is more or less technical. It is not a new appropriation—I mean not such within the meaning of the rule invoked by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is not a new appropriation; but it is an appropriation of money to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States during this fiscal year.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true, I think; but at the same time, Mr. President, that does not make any difference, according to my view of what this rule means. It is not a new expenditure of the Government. It is not an expenditure that is not already authorized by a law that the Congress has already passed. It is merely a reauthorization for money to be spent under an appropriation already made and in the way that Congress intended that it should be spent. That is the view of the committee, and I think that is the plain meaning of the two sections of the Revised Statutes to which I refer.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the first objection raised by the Senator from Georgia to the point of order is that the amendment relates to a provision for the pay of rural carriers. But, Mr. President, the House bill relates, and the whole bill relates, to appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year 1917, not 1915. That is the trouble with the Senator's first objection. He lays down the proposition that in an appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1917 you may offer an amendment relating to debts of this Government for the year 1915.

The second objection of the Senator from Georgia is equally untenable. He undertakes to say that unless the Senate can put any sort of legislation upon an appropriation bill, it has less power than the House. Stated differently, he lays down the proposition that if you strike out a part of the text of the House bill you may substitute for it any legislation, related to it or not. To prevent that is the very reason why the Senate adopted paragraph 3 of Rule XVI:

No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill, nor shall any amendment not germane or relevant to the subject matter contained in the bill be received.

Here is an appropriation to pay rural carriers for 1917, and the committee offer an amendment to pay a claim which they assert originated in 1915. How do they justify that? Not by the rules of the Senate, but in violation of the rules of the Senate. Not by the language of the law of 1915 or 1916—not at all. That language authorized the Postmaster General to pay to rural carriers not exceeding $1,200. He graded their salaries between $1,100 and $1,200, according to whether or not the additional burden of the parcel post justified that expenditure, inasmuch as it was claimed that the Parcel Post System would make the work more burdensome upon the rural carriers. But neither the Senator from Georgia nor anybody else can say that the Postmaster General was not within his rights when he did that. The mere fact that this amendment is offered shows that he was within his rights.

It is immaterial how much money is involved. It is a mere estimate, after all. It was stated a year ago that $3,000,000 was involved, and the amicus curiæ of the committee, Mr. Brown—an agent here for the rural carriers of the country, who tried to get out of them 25 cents apiece in order to file their claims before the Claims Committee of the Senate—said it amounts to $3,200,000. That is the second objection.

The third objection I have already referred to. Then I call the Chair's attention back to paragraph 4 of Rule XVI:

No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

Now, are these claims private claims? They are not claims which these men can enforce against the Government by law.

If the Postmaster General refused to pay them something to which they were entitled, they could go into the Court of Claims and enforce the payment of it.

As a last resort the Senator from Georgia lays down the proposition that the money remains there for five years—money appropriated for the fiscal year 1915. Mr. President, I do not believe that that is a correct statement of conditions. I think it is true that the money appropriated for the fiscal year 1915 would not revert to the Treasury if there was any legitimate claim upon it originating during the year 1915; but there was no legal claim against the department. Now they are trying to make a gift of a million and a half or three million dollars to men who can not go into any court and assert their claim to the money and maintain it, and it is being done on an appropriation bill; and that is the very purpose of the inclusion in the Senate rules of the various paragraphs of Rule XVI.

That is all I have to say about it. This thing has been tried before and has failed. It is true that a year ago it was so plain that nobody contended against the point of order. Now it is sought by all devices to justify this committee in placing a private claim or a number of private claims in an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that, inasmuch as an objection has been made to the division of the question, the point of order stands as a point of order against the entire amendment by reason of the frailty in the particular clause to which the Senator has directed attention.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, would I not have a right to make a point of order against this particular part of it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair does not so understand the rule. The present occupant of the chair understands that no point of order can be made against a part of an amendment. The point of order must be made against the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I make it against the whole amendment; but I suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits to the Senate the point of order made by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BRYAN. Let me prefer a unanimous request, then. I have never understood that to be the rule here. I ask unanimous consent that the Chair be allowed to pass on the point of order raised as to the last proviso in this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, that puts us in a remarkable position. You can have a part of an amendment that is unobjectionable and a part that is subject to a point of order, and the whole thing stands or falls together. I have never understood that to be the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would be very glad to be corrected if his opinion is wrong, but it appears to him that the language of the rule is perfectly plain, that a point of order must be directed against an amendment. Only one amendment is here proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Chair is perfectly correct in ruling on the latter point. I am in sympathy with the payment of these rural carriers as provided for in the last proviso, and I am in sympathy also with the amendment offered by the committee, but I am quite sure that if the amendment passes in the form it is now it would be impossible for the comptroller to pass upon the claims and pay the rural carriers under the provisions of the amendment.

There is no question but that every unexpended balance of an appropriation made by Congress has to be reappropriated before it can be used. The amount must be reappropriated before the Treasury of the United States can pay it out. We are not doing that in this amendment, and if we pass the amendment there will be a disappointment. I would rather see the chairman——

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield in just a moment. I would rather see the chairman of the committee withdraw the last proviso and act upon the forepart of the amendment, and then let the Senate take care of an appropriation for the rural carriers in the next deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me just ask this question. I understand that there is force in some of his objections. Would this language make it any better, in the Senator's mind, to substitute for the part the Senator from Florida is particularly directing his attention to—

That the unexpended balance, or so much thereof as may be necessary, appropriated for the pay of rural carriers for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, is hereby reappropriated.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that added to the proviso would greatly strengthen it, and I think that more than likely it would authorize the payment of the unexpended balance. I think if we are going to act the suggested amendment should be added.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will move to add it to the proviso.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator means, to add the words the Senator has just read.

Mr. HARDWICK. Adding them at the end of line 18.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understand it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would not that cure the objection the Senator has in mind?

Mr. SMOOT. It cures it, because I think that it would authorize the payment of the unexpended balance, and I do not believe we ought to pass any legislation when we know that balance can not be paid under it.

Mr. HARDWICK. In order to obviate the difficulty the Senator has about a dangerous precedent, and that doubtless many other Senators here might have on both sides of the Chamber, we will offer that as soon as we get through with this proposition. That will cure it, I am sure.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I have no further objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Then let us have it in the entirety, and I raise the point of order against the whole of the amendment. It is clear that this part of it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I wish to make one remark upon the point of order. The entire argument of the Senator from Florida, of course, is based upon the assumption that we are dealing only with a general appropriation bill. If that were the case, I would have no objection to a point of order, because there is no exception in the rule of the Senate which prohibits general legislation on general appropriation bills.

But the situation is quite different here, for the part of the measure that we are speaking of now is not an appropriation bill at all. It seems to be generally conceded that this portion of the bill coming from the House is general legislation, and unless we are to apply Rule XVI of the Senate without exception we must be free to deal with the subject matter of the proposition which was sent to the Senate by the House according to its nature. That is legislation relative to changing the law on the subject of the establishment of rural routes and the payment of rural carriers. It has nothing to do with a general appropriation bill.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course the Senator from Washington can not take that position. This is a general appropriation bill and this is an amendment offered to such a bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is very true, but we can draw a distinction between a general appropriation bill in those parts which provide for general appropriations and something that is hitched to it by the House of Representatives which does not provide for a general appropriation and has no relation to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the point of order raised by the Senator from Florida be sustained?

Mr. KERN. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, his amendment will be in order after we dispose of this point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who believe that the point of order should be sustained will say aye. [Putting the question.] Contrary, no. The noes appear to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair for this evening with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], who is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan], who is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when the name of Mr. WALSH was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. In the absence of that Senator I withhold my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Maine (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TAGGART] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and also that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. OVERMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST. I rise to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona], who is detained by reason of illness in his family.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to my colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON];

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS];

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]; and

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—13.

Borah	Johnson, Me.	Lee, Md.	Williams
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Smoot
Gore	Kern	Tillman
Husting	La Follette	Walsh

NAYS—37.

Gallinger	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the point of order is overruled.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment to come in after the words "nineteen hundred and fifteen," in line 18, page 34.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 34, line 18, after the words "nineteen hundred and fifteen," insert:

And that the unexpended balance, or so much thereof as may be necessary, appropriated for the pay of rural carriers for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, is hereby reappropriated.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I raise a point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will state his point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. No estimate has been made for it. Therefore it is vulnerable under paragraph 1 of Rule XVI. This is an appropriation of money and—

No amendments shall be received—

Says the rule—

to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation—

And so forth.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not care to discuss it again. This is an amendment I have offered in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which I thought was sound to avoid some troubles which might grow out of the language used. I think it ought to be adopted. There is exactly the same parliamentary question involved in it that was involved in the other matter, and I can not see why there should be any prolongation either of debate or fight upon the point.

Mr. SMOOT. It was not estimated for because of the fact that it had already been appropriated for and the amendment is simply reappropriating money already estimated for. Therefore, Mr. President, I hardly think that the question raised by the Senator from Florida is——

Mr. HARDWICK. There may be that difference between it and the other point of order, but outside of that it is the same.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only difference there is.

Mr. BRYAN. That will not do. It says "is hereby appropriated." What are we doing? We are appropriating money. That is all there is to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon the amendment, inasmuch as considerable criticism was made of the Post Office Department and its handling of the rural service, in justice to that Department I should like to put in the RECORD in a brief way what has been done for the benefit of the rural service of this country.

During President Taft's administration there were established 2,010 additional rural routes. During this administration there have been established 2,781 additional rural routes.

On March 1, 1913, there were 2,657 petitions pending for the establishment or extension of rural-route service. On April 1, 1916, there were only 741 petitions pending.

On March 1, 1913, the number of families served in the United States was 5,060,491. On April 1 this year there were being served 5,710,487 families, an increase of 649,996 families and an increase of the population served of between three and five million.

In the State of Georgia there were families served on March 1, 1913, 261,783. On the 1st of April, 1916, there were 290,623 families served, or an increase of 28,840 people, or an increase in the population served of nearly 150,000.

I ask, Mr. President, that this table showing the service in each of the States may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. KERN. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall in any way affect automobile routes already established where good and efficient service satisfactory to the postmasters at the points of distribution of the mail to be delivered is being rendered. Nor shall the provisions of this section apply to rural carriers who have been heretofore appointed and who have purchased or contracted for automobiles intended and designed for use in such Rural Delivery Service.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I have no desire for the present to address myself strictly to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. I do not know that I am particularly opposed to it. There is a good deal of justice in some of the things he says, and as far as I am concerned, while I am not going to advocate it, I am not particularly opposed to it.

I want to say just one word in reference to the statement of the Senator from Florida. I do not want anybody on either side of the Chamber to misunderstand the attitude of either of the Senators from Georgia. I quite agree that since this administration began and up to 12 months ago, when it undertook this reorganization, it had given us a splendid Rural Delivery Service. Petitions that were years old have been favorably acted on, and until we got into this difficulty with the Post Office Department as to the pay of these rural carriers we had no trouble whatever. I am going to be perfectly plain about it. The department would not carry out the real intent of Congress on that subject. Up to that time the Post Office Department had increased the Rural Delivery Service and was administering it in a perfectly satisfactory manner. I fully indorse what the Senator from Florida said in that respect, but I do say this: When the department undertook the readjustment of the service about a year ago, it seems to me that because of the fact that Congress thought these carriers ought to have more pay one division of the service particularly undertook to take it out upon the Rural Delivery Service.

In my State they not only established automobile routes most improvidently and most unwisely by scores and hundreds, but they lengthened horse-drawn vehicle routes 24 and 25 miles long to 30 miles and in some cases to 31 and 32 miles, and made them so long that they could no longer render the efficient service that had been rendered in the past.

That is my complaint about this so-called reorganization. It is not directed to the general policy nor to any of the acts of the department prior to this recent reorganization, which we are trying now to stop.

I do not want to be misunderstood about it. I have no feeling whatever in the matter. Some conduct of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General does not appeal to either Democratic or Republican members of the committee. At a later time and in a different way, and on a different occasion, I expect to call the attention of the Senate to that in more detail. I have no feeling whatever against the service, against the administration, or against the department on account of any of these occurrences. We are simply trying to improve the service, and it is my honest and humble judgment that there is not a provision in the amendment the committee unanimously agreed upon, and that the Senate I hope and believe will sustain, that is not directed to the very best interests of the service, and will not immeasurably improve the efficiency and morale of the service in every particular.

I do not want any Senator on this side or the other side to think that there is anything in the amendment suggested by the committee that has grown out of the slightest feeling, personal or otherwise, that any member of the Senate committee might have against the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. That is not true. This is an amendment drawn in good faith to secure what we believe will secure the best possible service to the rural population of the United States, and that is all there is to it. There is nothing beyond that or besides that in the mind or action of the committee.

As far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana is concerned, while I have no authority from the committee to accept it I have no objection, if the Senator wants to insist upon it, to putting it in and letting the conference work it out. I do not know in what form it can be worked out. If the Senator from Alabama, who is in charge of the bill, does not raise any objection to it, I shall raise no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator in charge of the bill that in view of the adoption of this amendment the word "further" ought to be inserted after the word "Provided" in line 22.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; the word "further" ought to be inserted after the next word "Provided," as the Chair suggests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARDWICK. Has the amendment reported by the committee been voted upon yet?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The question is on the amendment offered by the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 20, after the words "third class," to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$250,000," so as to make the clause read:

For village delivery service in towns and villages having post offices of the second or third class, $250,000.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to strike out lines 19, 20, and 21, which strikes out the entire appropriation. This is the outgrowth of a policy established two or three years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that amendments on the floor are not now in order, as the Senate is proceeding to consider the committee amendments. So the Chair is obliged to rule that the amendment of the Senator from Florida is not now in order.

Mr. BRYAN. I oppose the increase of the appropriation. We began four or five years ago making an appropriation of $50,000 for experimental village-delivery service and that language has remained in the law until this year. The House has stricken out the word "experimental" and it now reads "for village-delivery service." Of course that is better because there is no experiment about the proposition as to whether a man can take a mail sack down the street of a village and deliver mail out of it. The Post Office Department has never asked for it. It has been increased over the objection of the department from $50,000 to $100,000 and from $150,000 to $200,000, and now the Senate committee wants to increase it to a quarter of a million dollars.

The Post Office Department say that, while they do not want it, they have used the appropriation to establish a village service in one village in each congressional district. That necessarily means, Mr. President, that other villages of the same population will also demand this service, and they will have justice behind their demands. When you establish the service in one village in each congressional district and begin to multiply it, then what have you done? You have then established a delivery service in every village. Then you have increased your appropriations for this service until they will amount to as much as the cost of the Rural Delivery Service in this country.

It seems to me it would be a good idea to stop it now when it is so small. They have just about gotten around, I understand, so that there is one in most of the congressional districts in the country. The Post Office Department in every hearing has protested against having this money. As I said before, it is no experiment; it is simply done to favor a village or a town in a district. Of course, when that town is taken care of other towns similarly situated will make the same appeal.

I hope the amendment of the committee will not be agreed to. The Post Office Department, of course, did not estimate for it, but the committee have the right to increase the appropriation.

Mr. HARDWICK. The department estimated $200,000.

Mr. BRYAN. They estimated $200,000, but they did not estimate for this extra $50,000. The committee merely felt generous, felt rich, and put it in the bill; that is all. They had a right to do it; there is no point of order about it. It is just simply a policy that ought to be stopped now when it has not grown to such proportions that it will be impossible to stop it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this item in the appropriation bill has been carried for a number of years. It is true that there has been an increase from the original appropriation, which was $50,000. It is true the Post Office Department estimates $200,000, but the committee thought this service was of such a character, that it was so important, and that there was such a demand for its extension, that they might very well recommend an increase of $50,000 in the appropriation.

For myself, Mr. President, I hope that the Congress of the United States will continue to increase this appropriation. I think that there are a great many towns in the country too small to receive delivery service under existing law, which are entitled to benefits of this character. Of course they can not all be established at once; but there can be no objection, as I see it, to gradually increasing this appropriation, when there is such a demand for it and when the benefits that accrue from it are so universally recognized. I hope, therefore, the amendment will stand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama takes his seat, I should like to ask what is now the dividing line? What towns receive the city delivery as a matter of right?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the operation of this appropriation, my understanding is that the towns must have a population of 5,000. Of course, for city delivery they must have 10,000, and they must also have $10,000 of postal receipts. Under the provisions of this bill, village-delivery service is limited to towns having 5,000 population, but there is no limit, as I understand, as to the postal receipts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, any city with less than 10,000 population has no city delivery?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the limitation is $5,000 annual receipts. Any town or village with annual postal receipts of as much as $5,000 can get this delivery where it is not entitled to city delivery under the postal regulations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. First, I want to ascertain what towns are entitled to city delivery?

Mr. HARDWICK. Such towns in each State as have more than $5,000 receipts and are not entitled to city delivery, as are designated by the Post Office Department.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I am first asking what towns are entitled to city delivery?

Mr. HARDWICK. Where the receipts are over $10,000 and the population is over 10,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, any town with less than 10,000 population and with less than $10,000 of annual receipts is not entitled to city delivery?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This paragraph proposes, as a matter of favor, to extend the service to some of the towns that have 5,000 population?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; which have $5,000 of postal receipts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Five thousand dollars of postal receipts; and how much population?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is no requirement as to population.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then it is a matter of favor to be decided by the Postmaster General?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me go over the ground for just a minute. In a city entitled to city delivery there must either be 5,000 population or $10,000 annual postal receipts. This provision is for a class of towns and villages that do not come up to those requirements, and yet that do have as much as $5,000 of annual postal receipts. It covers a class of villages and of small towns.

Of course, the Senator understands that this is experimental legislation in a way; I think this is the first year that the words "experimental village delivery" have been left out of this legislation. We have been experimenting with it; we have used just two or three cities and smaller towns in each congressional district; a few in each State; one or two to the congressional district. Usually, on the recommendation of the Senators and Representatives to the department, these towns have been selected. The idea of the committee in increasing this appropriation was that the experiment has proven successful; that all of these cities and villages ought to have this delivery down to the $5,000 limit as rapidly as it can be supplied and the postal funds will authorize. We believe, as the Senator suggested, that there ought to be no favoritism about it, and that as rapidly as possible we ought to give all the towns within these limits village delivery.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, what I am really trying to get at is, What limitation is placed upon the discretionary power of the Postmaster General? May he give this service to any village or may he only give it to some villages of a certain population or a certain business?

Mr. HARDWICK. He can give it to any town that has as much as $5,000 of annual postal receipts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Within the limits of the appropriation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Within the limits of the appropriation, of course.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What logical reason is there for denying the city delivery to all towns?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to hear the Senator ask that question. In reply, I will say that I do not think there is any reason for it. I think, as rapidly as we can possibly do it, we ought to extend this village delivery to every one of the towns in the United States that come within these limits. That is the reason your committee increased the amount. We want to accomplish that as fast as we can.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is there any estimate of the number of towns or the amount of appropriation that would be necessary to make this service universal?

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir; but we know enough to know that it is a very large proposition. We can not get to it except gradually, as the postal funds will authorize, as certain economies are effected in other branches of the service and as revenues are provided for in other ways. We know that it can not be done at once; we do not believe it ought to be dropped. Wherever this service has been established the testimony is universal that it is a great success, and we want to continue it and extend it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Are there any restrictions or limitations on the bestowal of the delivery connected with buildings and sidewalks? I have in mind that at times postal facilities have been refused to towns because they were without adequate pavements or sidewalks. What is the law on that subject?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will quote from the hearings. The towns must have $5,000 annual postal receipts—not less than that. They must also have street lights, pavements, house numbers, signs on the street corners, and private mail receptacles. What happens is this: If one of these towns is designated by the Postmaster General in any State to receive this service, the department at once inquires about these things. If it has not got them, the department requires the town to put them up or to provide street names, numbers, and so on, and reasonably good pavements before they will undertake to establish free delivery; but if they will not put the streets in proper condition the department will give the service to some other town possessing the necessary qualifications and willing to comply with the departmental requirements.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. In replying to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the impression may have been received that the requirements just stated are requirements of the law.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not true. They are requirements of the Post Office Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. They are simply regulations that can be changed at any time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; they are regulations of the Post Office Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. How many towns and villages are there in the United States having second or third class post offices?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know that I can answer that question. I can probably get the information accurately for the Senator, but I have not got it right now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the Senator from Georgia any information in regard to what it would cost if all the towns and villages of the country were served by letter carriers?

Mr. HARDWICK. We have not; we have had no estimates of that kind. Therefore we did not undertake to increase this appropriation largely. I will say, however, answering the question of the Senator from Iowa, that it appears that there are 533 first-class post offices in the United States and 2,138 second-class post offices. All of those are entitled, as I understand, to the city delivery under the law. There are 6,249 third-class post offices, and most of those, not all of them—I do not know what per cent of them, but, anyhow, a considerable per cent of the post offices embraced in that class—might come within the postal regulations and be entitled to this village delivery service. The committee does not know how many, because we did not feel able at the present time to undertake a great extension of this service.

Mr. CUMMINS. I dismiss the regulations, because they can be changed at any moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator say that every second-class office is entitled to city delivery?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think, if the Senator will investigate the matter, he will find that that is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish I knew about what it would cost to furnish this service to all of the towns and villages, because I think that one is just as much entitled to it as is another; and if I were making the regulation I would a great deal rather give it to those towns that have no sidewalks or street lights, than to towns that have sidewalks and street lights, because it is more difficult for the people to reach the post offices in such towns and villages.

I think the Senator from Georgia ought to remember that it is one of the time-honored privileges of the citizens of a town or village to gather at the post office in order to get their mail. I really think there is more interchange of social thought and political thought, too, when these people come once or twice a day to the post office than we often give credit for. I doubt very much the wisdom of the United States delivering the mail in small places to the residences of the people who can with a very few steps reach the post office. Why does the Senator from Georgia think it ought to be done?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell the Senator why. We have tried it in the town where I live, which is a town of about 3,000 inhabitants, and everybody there is delighted with the service. Like most towns of that size, the houses are scattered probably a mile from the center of activities where the post office and courthouse are located, and some people live a good distance from the post office. A great many towns and villages would like to get this service. I have never heard of a village anywhere—North, East, South, or West—that did not want to get it, certainly not in the section of country from which I come. I can not see why such postal facilities should not be extended to the people of towns and villages as fast as we can supply the funds to do it as well as to the people living in rural sections and the people in the larger towns. It is only a question of having the money, and I do believe that it is one of the most desirable services to the development of which the Post Office Department can direct its future activities.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had not thought of the question very deeply, but if one town is entitled to it they are all entitled to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I do not think there ought to be any discrimination.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator, and that is why we are increasing the appropriation. We know, of course, that the amount we have appropriated will not anything like serve all the towns.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why does not the committee appropriate more, then?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell the Senator. We hope to do so after awhile, but we will have to get more information than we have, and I am afraid we will have to get more money than we have. I think those are two good reasons. We do not know how much it will take and we do not know that we have not got enough money to do it right now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 35, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 2. That the third proviso of the act of May 4, 1882 (22 Stats. L., ch. 116, p. 54), be amended as follows:

"If any person shall hereafter perform any service for any contractor or subcontractor in carrying the mail, he shall, upon filing in the department his contract for such service and satisfactory evidence of its performance, thereafter have a lien on any money due such contractor or subcontractor for such service to the amount of same; and if such contractor or subcontractor shall fail to pay the party or parties who have performed service as aforesaid the amount due for such service within two months after the expiration of the month in which such service shall have been performed the Postmaster General may cause the amount due to be paid said party or parties and charged to the contractor: Provided, That such payment shall not in any case exceed the rate of pay per annum of the contractor or subcontractor."

SEC. 3. That whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established or new service required, or when, from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding one year, until the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law: Provided, That the cost of temporary service rendered necessary by reason of the failure of any accepted bidder to enter into contract or a contractor to perform service shall be charged to such bidder or contractor.

SEC. 4. That whenever in the judgment of the Postmaster General the bids received for any star route are exorbitant or unreasonable, or whenever he has reason to believe that a combination of bidders has been entered into to fix the rate for star-route service, the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, out of the appropriation for inland transportation by star routes, to employ and use such means or methods to provide the desired service as he may deem expedient, without reference to existing law or laws respecting the employment of personal service or the procurement of conveyances, materials, or supplies.

SEC. 5. That section 3949 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

"All contracts for carrying the mail shall be in the name of the United States and shall be awarded to the lowest bidder tendering sufficient guaranties for faithful performance in accordance with the terms of the advertisement: Provided, however, That such contracts require due celerity, certainty, and security in the performance of the service; but the Postmaster General shall not be bound to consider the bid of any person who has willfully or negligently failed to perform a former contract."

SEC. 6. That the limit of weight of mail matter of the first class shall be the same as is applicable to mail of the fourth class: Provided, That no article or package exceeding 4 pounds in weight shall be admitted to the mails under the penalty privilege unless it comes within the exceptions named in the acts of June 8, 1896 (ch. 370, 29 Stats. L., p. 262), and June 26, 1906 (ch. 3546, 34 Stats. L., p. 477).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I should like some information in regard to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the information of the Senator I will say that the sections stricken out have already been enacted into law in the postal savings act.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask if that was not the case.

Mr. BANKHEAD. All of these sections which are stricken out in the bill—sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 11, 13, and 14—have been enacted into law.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been absent for a little time and have not kept very close watch on the proceedings of Congress. I will ask the Senator the status of the postal savings bank bill. Has it become a law?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has become a law, having been approved by the President.

Mr. GALLINGER. And these sections are in the law?

Mr. BANKHEAD. All the sections stricken out are in that law.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to have the question stated. I do not understand what the question is. I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 7. That so much of section 1 of the "Act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, which provides that the Post Office Department shall not extend or enlarge its present policy of sending second-class matter by freight trains, is hereby repealed.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in the course of the progress of the bill I observe that we have reached section 7. I desire to submit some observations on a motion I have previously entered with reference to striking out that section. I will ask the distinguished chairman of the committee if he would deem this an appropriate time for me to make the motion and discuss that question, or does he wish to proceed otherwise?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I prefer, Mr. President, to go right along with the bill. We might as well consider section 7 now as at any other time. I do not see any necessity for passing it over.

Mr. ASHURST. I desire, of course, to yield to the wishes of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee amendments were to be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think, perhaps, we had better complete the committee amendments before section 7 is taken up. I overlooked the fact that the committee amendments were to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that an agreement has been made to that effect. The Secretary will state the next amendment reported by the committee.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 38, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 8. That section 2 of the act of April 28, 1904 (ch. 1759, 33 Stat. L., p. 440), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That under such regulations as the Postmaster General may establish for the collection of the lawful revenue and for facilitating the handling of such matter in the mails it shall be lawful to accept for transmission in the mails without postage stamps affixed quantities of not less than 500 identical pieces of third-class matter and of second-class matter mailed at the special rates of 1 cent and 2 cents a copy, and 250 identical pieces of fourth-class matter and packages of money and securities mailed under postage at the first or fourth class rate by the Treasury Department: Provided, That postage shall be fully prepaid thereon at the rate required by law for a single piece of such matter."

SEC. 9. That postage stamps affixed to all mail matter or to stamped envelopes in which the same is inclosed shall, when deposited for mailing or delivery, be defaced by the postmaster at the mailing office: Provided, That when practicable postage stamps may be furnished to postmasters precanceled by printing on them the name of the post office at which they are to be used, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 8, to strike out:

SEC. 10. That the Postmaster General, in cases of emergency, between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and for such times may pay for their railroad transportation out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes at not exceeding the rate per pound per mile as shown by the last adjustment for mail service on the route over which they may be carried, and pay for necessary cartage out of the appropriation for freight or expressage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, after line 18, to strike out:

SEC. 11. That the act of March 4, 1909 (chap. 321, sec. 198, 35 Stats., p. 1126), be amended to read as follows:

"Whoever shall willfully or maliciously injure, tear down, or destroy any letter box or other receptacle intended or used for the receipt or delivery of mail on any mail route or shall break open the same, or shall willfully or maliciously injure, deface, or destroy any mail deposited therein, or shall willfully take or steal such mail from or out of such letter box or other receptacle, or shall willfully and maliciously assault any letter or mail carrier knowing him to be such while engaged on his route in the discharge of his duty as such carrier, or shall willfully aid or assist in any of the aforementioned offenses shall for every such offense be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, after line 21, to strike out:

SEC. 13. That so much of section 4 of an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912, as provides that no adjustment shall be made unless the diverted mails equal at least 10 per cent of the average daily weight on any of the routes affected is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, after line 4, to strike out:

SEC. 14. That when, during a weighing period, on account of floods or other causes, interruptions in service occur on railroad routes and weights of mail are decreased below the normal, or where there is an omission to take weights, the Postmaster General, for the purpose of readjusting compensation on such railroad routes as are affected thereby, is hereafter authorized, in his discretion, to add to the weights of mails ascertained on such routes during that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been normal the estimated weights for that part of the weighing period when conditions are shown to have been not normal or where there has been an omission to take weights, based upon the average of weights taken during that part of the weighing period during which conditions are shown to have been normal, the actual weights and the estimated weights to form the basis for the average weight per day upon which to readjust the compensation according to law on such railroad routes for the transportation of the mails, notwithstanding the provision of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1905, requiring that the average weight shall be ascertained by the actual weighing of the mails for such a number of successive working days, not less than 90, as the Postmaster General may direct: Provided further, That readjustments from July 1, 1913, may be made under this provision on routes in the first section affected by the floods in the Ohio Valley and tributary territories, commencing about March 25, 1913.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, page 42, line 22, after the word "directed," to strike out:

To readjust the compensation to be paid to railroad companies from and after the 30th day of June, 1916, or as soon thereafter as may be practicable, for the transportation and handling of the mails and furnishing facilities and services in connection therewith upon the conditions and at the rates hereinafter provided.

The Postmaster General may state railroad mail routes and authorize mail service thereon of the following four classes, namely: Full railway post-office car service, apartment railway post-office car service, storage-car service, and closed-pouch service.

Full railway post-office car mail service shall be service by cars 40 feet or more in length, constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. The authorizations of full railway post-office cars shall be for standard sized cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Apartment railway post-office car mail service shall be service by apartments less than 40 feet in length in cars constructed, fitted up, and maintained for the distribution of mails on trains. Two standard sizes of apartment railway post-office cars may be authorized and paid for, namely, apartments 15 feet and 30 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided.

Storage-car mail service shall be service by cars used for the storage and carriage of mails in transit other than by full and apartment railway post-office cars. The authorizations for storage cars shall be for cars 60 feet in length, inside measurement, except as hereinafter provided: Provided, That less than 60 feet of storage space may be authorized in baggage cars.

Service by full and apartment railway post-office cars and storage cars shall include the carriage therein of all mail matter, equipment, and supplies for the mail service and the employees of the Postal Service or Post Office Department, as shall be directed by the Postmaster General to be so carried: Provided, That no parcel-post package shall exceed 50 pounds in weight.

Closed-pouch mail service shall be the transportation and handling by railroad employees of mails on trains on which full or apartment railway post-office cars are not authorized, except as hereinbefore provided.

The rates of payment for the services authorized in accordance with this act shall be as follows, namely:

For full railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

For apartment railway post-office car mail service at not exceeding 11 cents for each mile of service by a 30-foot apartment car and 6 cents for each mile of service by a 15-foot apartment car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $2.75 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 30-foot apartment car and $2 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 15-foot apartment car.

For storage-car mail service at not exceeding 21 cents for each mile of service by a 60-foot car.

In addition thereto he may allow not exceeding $4.25 as a combined initial and terminal rate for each one-way trip of a 60-foot car.

Where authorizations are made for cars of the standard lengths of 60, 30, and 15 feet, as provided by this act, and the railroad company is unable to furnish such cars of the length authorized, but furnishes cars of lesser length than those authorized, but which are determined by the department to be sufficient for the service, the Postmaster General may accept the same and pay only for the actual space furnished and used, the compensation to be not exceeding pro rata of that provided by this act for the standard length so authorized: Provided, That the Postmaster General may accept cars and apartments of greater length than those of the standard requested, but no compensation shall be allowed for such excess lengths.

For closed-pouch service, at not exceeding the following rates, when a 3-foot unit is authorized, a terminal charge of 50 cents for a round trip, or 25 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 1½ cents per mile for the authorized number of miles. When a 7-foot unit is authorized, a terminal charge of $1 for a round trip, or 50 cents for a single trip, irrespective of the distance run, and in addition thereto a line charge at the rate of 3 cents per mile for the authorized number of miles.

The Postmaster General may require railroad companies carrying the mails to deliver them into and take them from the terminal and intermediate post offices and transfer them between railroad stations on their routes without additional compensation, under such regulations as he may deem proper, in cases where he does not provide for such service otherwise: Provided, That the Postmaster General in his discretion may relieve any of the roads of such service.

Railroad companies whose railroads were constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress, on the condition that the mails should be transported over their roads at such price as Congress should by law direct, shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation otherwise authorized by this act.

The initial and terminal rates provided for herein shall cover expenses of loading and unloading mails, switching, lighting, heating, cleaning mail cars, and all other expenses incidental to station service and required by the Postmaster General in connection with the mails that are not included in the car-mile rate. The allowance for full railway post-office cars, apartment railway post-office cars, and storage cars may be varied in accordance with the approximate difference in their respective cost of construction and maintenance.

In computing the car-miles of the full railway post-office cars and apartment railway post-office cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless otherwise mutually agreed upon.

In computing the car-miles of storage cars, the maximum space authorized in either direction of a round-trip car run shall be regarded as the space to be computed in both directions, unless the car be used by the company in the return movement, or otherwise mutually agreed upon.

New service and additional service may be authorized at not exceeding the rates herein provided, and service may be reduced or discontinued with pro rata reductions in pay, as the needs of the Postal Service may require: Provided, That no additional pay shall be allowed for additional service unless specifically authorized by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized to make special contracts with the railroad companies for the transportation of the mails where, in his judgment, the conditions warrant the application of higher rates than those herein specified, and make report to Congress of all cases where such special contracts are made and the terms and reasons therefor.

All cars or parts of cars used for the Railway Mail Service shall be of such construction, style, length, and character, and furnished in such manner as shall be required by the Postmaster General, and shall be constructed, fitted up, maintained, heated, lighted, and cleaned by and at the expense of the railroad companies. No pay shall be allowed for service by any railway post-office car which is not sound in material and construction and which is not equipped with sanitary drinking water containers and toilet facilities, nor unless such car is regularly and thoroughly cleaned. No pay shall be allowed for service by any wooden full railway post-office car unless constructed substantially in accordance with the most approved plans and specifications of the Post Office Department for such type of cars, nor for service by any wooden full railway post-office car run in any train between adjoining steel cars, or between the engine and a steel car adjoining. After the 1st of July, 1917, the Postmaster General shall not approve or allow to be used, or pay for service by, any full railway post-office car not constructed of steel or steel underframe or equally indestructible material; and all full railway post-office cars accepted for this service and contracted for by the railroad companies hereafter shall be constructed of steel. Until July 1, 1917, in cases of emergency and in cases where the necessities of the service require it, the Postmaster General may provide for service by full railway post-office cars of other than steel or steel underframe construction, and fix therefor such rate of compensation within the maximum herein provided as shall give consideration to the inferior character of construction, and the railroad companies shall furnish service by such cars at such rates so fixed.

Service over property owned or controlled by another company or a terminal company shall be considered service of the railroad company using such property and not that of the other or terminal company: Provided, That service over land-grant road shall be paid for as herein provided.

Railroad companies carrying mails shall furnish all necessary facilities for caring for and handling them while in their custody. They shall furnish all cars or parts of cars used in the transportation and distribution of the mails, except as is herein otherwise provided, and place them in stations before the departure of trains at such times and when required to do so. They shall provide station space and rooms for handling, distribution, and transfer of mails in transit, and for offices and rooms for the employees of the Postal Service engaged in such transportation when required by the Postmaster General.

Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates and without extra charge therefor the persons in charge of the mails when on duty and traveling to and from duty, and all duly accredited agents and officers of the Post Office Department and the Postal Service, while traveling on official business, upon the exhibition of their credentials.

If any railroad company carrying the mails shall fail or refuse to provide cars or apartments in cars for distribution purposes when required by the Postmaster General, or shall fail or refuse to construct, fit up, maintain, heat, light, and clean such cars and provide such appliances for use in case of accident as may be required by the Postmaster General, it shall be fined such reasonable sum as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General shall in all cases decide upon what trains and in what manner the mails shall be conveyed. Every railroad company carrying the mails shall carry on any train it operates, and with due speed, all mailable matter, equipment, and supplies directed to be carried thereon. If any such railroad company shall fail or refuse to transport the mails, equipment, and supplies when required by the Postmaster General on any train or trains it operates, such company shall be fined such reasonable amount as may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be deemed proper.

The Postmaster General may make deductions from the pay of railroad companies carrying the mails under the provisions of this act for reduction in service or infrequency of service where, in his judgment, the importance of the facilities withdrawn or reduced requires it, and impose fines upon them for delinquencies. He may deduct the price of the value of the service in cases where it is not performed, and not exceeding three times its value if the failure be occasioned by the fault of the railroad company.

The provisions of this section shall apply to service operated by railroad companies partly by railroad and partly by steamboats.

The provisions of this section respecting the rates of compensation shall not apply to mails conveyed under special arrangement in freight trains, for which rates not exceeding the usual and just freight rates may be paid, in accordance with the classifications and tariffs approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Railroad companies carrying the mails shall submit, under oath, when and in such form as may be required by the Postmaster General, evidence as to the performance of service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to employ such clerical and other assistance as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section, and to rent quarters in Washington, D. C., if necessary, for the clerical force engaged thereon, and to pay for the same out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes, and hereafter detailed estimates shall be submitted for such services in the annual Book of Estimates.

The Postmaster General shall, from time to time, request information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the revenue received by railroad companies from express companies for services rendered in the transportation of express matter, and may, in his discretion, arrange for the transportation of mail matter other than of the first class at rates not exceeding those so ascertained and reported to him, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to carry such mail matter at such rates fixed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General is authorized, in his discretion, to petition the Interstate Commerce Commission for the determination of a postal carload or less-than-carload rate for transportation of mail matter of the fourth class and periodicals, and may provide for and authorize such transportation, when practicable, at such rates, and it shall be the duty of the railroad companies to provide and perform such service at such rates and on the conditions prescribed by the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General may, in his discretion, distinguish between the several classes of mail matter and provide for less frequent dispatches of mail matter of the third and fourth classes and periodicals when lower rates for transportation or other economies may be secured thereby without material detriment to the service.

The Postmaster General is authorized to return to the mails, when practicable for the utilization of car space paid and not needed for the mails, postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the Postal Service.

The Postmaster General in cases of emergency between October 1 and April 1 of any year, may hereafter return to the mails empty mail bags and other equipment theretofore withdrawn therefrom as required by law, and, where such return requires additional authorization of car space under the provisions of this section, to pay for the transportation thereof as provided for herein out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

The Postmaster General may have the weights of mail taken on railroad mail routes, and computations of the average loads of the several classes of cars and other computations for statistical and administrative purposes made at such times as he may elect, and pay the expenses thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes.

It shall be unlawful for any railroad company to refuse to perform mail service at the rates of compensation provided by law when and for the period required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for every such offense it shall be fined not exceeding $5,000.

After the rates specified in this section shall have been adopted the Interstate Commerce Commission shall, whenever requested by the Postmaster General or by the representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 51 per cent of the mileage of railroads carrying mail, make an investigation of the justice and reasonableness of rates then in effect, grant hearings to parties in interest, and report to Congress at the earliest practicable date thereafter the results of such investigation, making specific findings as to whether the rates fixed herein should be increased or decreased, and if either, how much. Such report shall show for each steam railroad operating company, if practicable, the amount of mail service rendered, the cost of performing same, and a comparison of the earnings of such railroad company from the mail traffic with those from express traffic and other passenger-train traffic. For the purpose of such investigations the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have all powers which it is now authorized to exercise in the investigation of the reasonableness of rates, and the Postmaster General shall supply such information regarding the mail service as may be requested by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

That the appropriation for inland transportation by railroad routes and for railway post office car service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, are hereby made available for the purposes of this section.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

From and after the passage of this act, and not less frequently than once every year, to cause the United States mails to be weighed simultaneously on all railroad mail routes for a period of 30 successive working days, and when such annual weighing is completed he shall readjust the annual compensation of railway mail pay on the basis of the average daily weight of all the mail carried on each route as ascertained by the actual weight taken, as herein provided, which readjustment shall be effective on and after the 1st day of July following such weighing: Provided, That such annual weighing shall only be had in those cases in which railroad companies carrying the mails shall perform the work of weighing the mails under the supervision and direction of the Postmaster General and without expense to the Government: Provided further, That in case any contractor for a railway mail route shall refuse or fail to perform the work of weighing without expense to the Government, then the mails on such route shall be weighed quadrennially in the manner above provided.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to hold hearings and to make a thorough investigation into the justness and reasonableness of existing rates of railway mail pay and of the practices and regulations of the Post Office Department in respect thereto and in regard to the service required to be performed therefor.

The commission shall also hold hearings and thoroughly investigate the so-called "space" plan and the so-called "weight" plan of railway mail pay, and any combination of the two, and any other plan that may seem to afford an accurate and fair basis for determining what compensation is just and reasonable both to the Government and the railroads for the carrying of the mails.

The commission is making such investigation shall consider efficiency and economy in service, both from the standpoint of the Government and the railroads, and shall also consider the relations existing between the railroads as public service corporations and the Government.

The commission shall not only investigate the system or plan of fixing railway mail pay but it shall also hold hearings and carefully and thoroughly investigate the question as to what rates of compensation should be allowed to the railroads under whatever plan or system is suggested or adopted.

The commission shall, as soon as possible, conduct and conclude the investigation herein provided, and report to Congress the result of its investigations, and its recommendations thereon.

For the purpose of making such investigation the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby vested with all the powers which it is now authorized by law to exercise in the investigation of the justness and reasonableness of freight, passenger, and express rates, and the regulation of railroads and express companies, and the Postmaster General, the railroad carriers, and express companies shall supply such information regarding the railway mail pay as the Interstate Commerce Commission may request and shall be given full opportunity to be heard.

If the Postmaster General shall find on experience that the classification of articles mailable, as well as the weight limit, or the rates of postage, zone or zones, and other conditions of mailability, under section 8 of the act approved August 24, 1912, or any of them, are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable, or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized to reform from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones, or conditions, or either, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof: Provided, however, That before any change is hereafter made in weight limit, rates of postage, or zone or zones, by the Postmaster General, the proposed change shall be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is hereby directed to hold hearings and to make a thorough and independent investigation of the question for the purpose of determining whether such proposed change will promote the Parcel Post Service to the public and insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed from and after the passage of this act and not less frequently than once every year to cause the United States mails to be weighed simultaneously on all railroad mail routes for a period of 30 successive working-days, and when such annual weighing is completed he shall readjust the annual compensation of railway mail pay on the basis of the average daily weight of all the mail carried on each route as ascertained by the actual weight taken, as herein provided, which readjustment shall be effective on and after the 1st day of July following such weighing: Provided, That such annual weighing shall only be had in those cases in which railroad companies carrying the mails shall perform the work of weighing the mails under the supervision and direction of the Postmaster General and without expense to the Government: Provided further, That in case any contractor for a railway mail route shall refuse or fail to perform the work of weighing without expense to the Government, then the mails on such route shall be weighed quadrennially in the manner above provided.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to hold hearings and to make a thorough investigation into the justness and reasonableness of existing rates of railway mail pay and of the practices and regulations of the Post Office Department in respect thereto and in regard to the service required to be performed therefor.

The commission shall also hold hearings and thoroughly investigate the so-called "space" plan and the so-called "weight" plan of railway mail pay, and any combination of the two, and any other plan that may seem to afford an accurate and fair basis for determining what compensation is just and reasonable both to the Government and the railroads for the carrying of the mails.

The commission in making such investigation shall consider efficiency and economy in service, both from the standpoint of the Government and the railroads, and shall also consider the relations existing between the railroads as public service corporations and the Government.

The commission shall not only investigate the system or plan of fixing railway mail pay, but it shall also hold hearings and carefully and thoroughly investigate the question as to what rates of compensation should be allowed to the railroads under whatever plan or system is suggested or adopted.

The commission shall, as soon as possible, conduct and conclude the investigation herein provided, and report to Congress the result of its investigations and its recommendations thereon.

For the purpose of making such investigation the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby vested with all the powers which it is now authorized by law to exercise in the investigation of the justness and reasonableness of freight, passenger, and express rates, and the regulation of railroads and express companies, and the Postmaster General, the railroad carriers, and express companies shall supply such information regarding railway mail pay as the Interstate Commerce Commission may request and shall be given full opportunity to be heard.

If the Postmaster General shall find on experience that the classification of articles mailable, as well as the weight limit, or the rates of postage, zone or zones, and other conditions of mailability, under section 8 of the act approved August 24, 1912, or any of them, are such as to prevent the shipment of articles desirable or to permanently render the cost of the service greater than the receipts of the revenue therefrom, he is hereby authorized to re-form from time to time such classification, weight limit, rates, zone or zones, or conditions, or either, in order to promote the service to the public or to insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof: Provided, however, That before any change is hereafter made in weight limit, rates of postage, or zone or zones by the Postmaster General the proposed change shall be approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is hereby directed to hold hearings and to make a thorough and independent investigation of the question for the purpose of determining whether such proposed change will promote the Parcel Post Service to the public and insure the receipt of revenue from such service adequate to pay the cost thereof.

During the reading of the amendment,

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, many of these provisions appear to me to be of considerable importance, and I am trying to follow the Secretary as he reads them. I find considerable difficulty in keeping up with him at the pace at which he is going; and I just rose to suggest that they be read at such measure as would enable Members of the Senate to comprehend them as we are going along. Otherwise, the reading is hardly worth while.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the proposed amendment of the committee, which I ask to have read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from Colorado offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 57, line 2, after the word "thereon," it is proposed to add the following:

And the system or plan of fixing railway mail pay to be so reported shall be accepted by the Congress and the railway companies as final, and made the basis thereafter of the systems of railway mail pay without any further or other inquiry relating thereto.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the Senator from Colorado offer the amendment so that it is now the pending question?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I offer it and ask to have it printed. I shall call it up later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. THOMAS. If there is any question about the regularity of my offering the amendment at the present time, I will withdraw it and offer it later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sees no objection to the Senator offering the amendment in this way.

Mr. THOMAS. The suggestion is made that we may reach the amendment to the amendment before it has been printed; but I hardly think we will do so to-day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, some time ago I offered and had printed an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senate committee which I regard as of some importance. I had rather understood from the chairman of the committee that he did not desire to enter upon the consideration of that amendment this afternoon, but possibly I misunderstood him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think perhaps the Senator did misunderstand me. I can see no reason why we should not now consider the amendment. I am very anxious to secure final action on the bill; and if it is not objectionable to the Senator, I should be glad if he would go on now.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection at all. I am quite ready, but I thought I was deferring to the wishes of the chairman of the committee.

I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to substitute for the committee amendment, beginning on line 1, page 56, and ending with line 11, page 57, the following:

All common carriers are hereby required to transport such mail matter as may be offered for transportation by the United States in the manner, under the conditions, and with the service prescribed by the Postmaster General and shall be entitled to receive fair and reasonable compensation for such transportation and for the service connected therewith.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine from time to time the fair and reasonable rates and compensation for the transportation of such mail matter and the service connected therewith and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the commission after due notice and hearing.

The procedure for the ascertainment of said rates and compensation shall be as follows:

Within three months from the passage of this act the Postmaster General shall file with the commission a statement showing the transportation required of all common carriers, including the number, equipment, size, and construction of the cars necessary for the transaction of the business; the character and speed of the trains which are to carry the various kinds of mail; the service, both terminal and en route, which the carriers are to render; and all other information which may be material to the inquiry. The commission may require the statement of any facts which it deems relevant to the investigation. The Postmaster General shall also state what he believes to be the reasonable rate or compensation the several carriers should receive. Thereupon the commission shall give notice of not less than 30 days to each carrier so required to transport mail and render service, and upon a day to be fixed by the commission each of said carriers shall make answer and the commission shall proceed with the hearing as now provided by law for other hearings between carriers and shippers or associations.

All the provisions of the law for taking testimony, securing evidence, penalties, and procedure are hereby made applicable.

At the conclusion of the hearing the commission shall establish by order a fair reasonable rate or compensation to be received by each carrier, at such stated times as may be named in the order, for the transportation of mail matter and the service connected therewith, and during the continuance of the order the Postmaster General shall pay the carrier from the appropriation herein made such rate or compensation.

Either the Postmaster General or any carrier may at any time after the lapse of six months from the entry of the order assailed apply for a reexamination, and thereupon substantially similar proceedings shall be had.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby vested with all the powers which it is now authorized by law to exercise in the investigation and ascertainment of the justness and reasonableness of freight, passenger, and express rates to be paid by private shippers.

In the case of any carrier which has received, directly or indirectly, through succession a public-land grant the value of the grant or donation shall not be considered in determining the value of the railway property.

This section shall not apply to that part of the foreign mail service performed by steamships plying between the United States and a foreign country.

The existing law for the determination of mail pay shall continue in effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission under the provisions hereof fixes the fair, reasonable rate or compensation for such transportation and service.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it will be at once observed that the amendment I have proposed presents a fundamental question with regard to the relation between the Government of the United States and the several railways which are required to transport mail.

I gave some study to this inquiry three or four years ago, while the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress was carrying on a very elaborate investigation into the subject. I reached the conclusion then that there was but one fair thing to do, namely, to empower and require the tribunal which we have established for the purpose of determining rates, so far as the general public is concerned, to ascertain and establish the fair compensation to which railway companies are entitled, or will become entitled, for the service which they render to the Government as an organized society.

Some things have transpired since the conclusion I have suggested was reached which have tended to impair somewhat my confidence in that high tribunal. I must say that in perfect frankness—not that my confidence in the integrity of the members of the commission has been lessened, but some things have occurred that have shaken my faith in the point of view which the commission, or some members of it, have assumed. Nevertheless, the Interstate Commerce Commission is a permanent tribunal, as I believe, in the affairs of the United States. No matter what mistakes it may have made, or what mistakes it may make in the future, we have created it for the especial purpose of determining what compensation the common carriers of the United States should receive for the service which they render, and I believe that the Government itself, which pays to the railway companies every year more than any other patron of the common-carrier system, ought to intrust to this tribunal the settlement of the very vexatious dispute which has now continued in the United States for about 40 years.

The present plan for the payment of compensation to the railway companies for the transportation of mail had its origin, I think, in the law of 1873. It has been somewhat modified from time to time, but the system that is now in force was organized in that year. Under it the railway companies carry mail through contract with the Post Office Department. The compensation, although there is a maximum in the law, is fixed by the terms of the contracts, and it is based upon the weight of the mail transported, with one exception. In the so-called railway post-office cars—the traveling post offices—where mail is assorted for ultimate delivery, there is a payment that does not depend upon the weight of the mail, but this exception is limited to cars or apartments 40 feet or more in length.

The total compensation, speaking in round numbers, paid by the Government to the railway companies of this country annually, is $60,000,000—a sum so vast that it at once challenges the interest of every Senator and every citizen. There has been, as I remarked a moment ago, a continuous controversy about the compensation that should be paid and the basis or standard which should be adopted in order to arrive at the annual payment, for nearly 40 years. For 38 years it has been an active dispute in Congress and between the Post Office Department and the several common carriers.

Aside from the almost innumerable congressional investigations that have taken place—and they have occurred almost every year—there have been at least five careful, exhaustive inquiries made by special committees or commissions.

First, through what is known as the Hubbard Commission in 1878; second, through what is known as the Elmer-Thompson-Slater Commission in 1883; third, through what is known as the Wolcott-Loud Commission in 1901; fourth, through the Post Office Department itself, carried on principally by the then Postmaster General, Mr. Hitchcock; and fifth, and the most elaborate of them all, by the joint committee of the two Houses, raised I believe in 1911 or possibly a little earlier than that, composed of men who were highly skilled in the subject and who gave to the investigation the most deliberate and protracted attention.

Notwithstanding all these investigations, each of which was followed by a report, the controversy is as active, as unsettled, as uncertain as ever before. We have not advanced a single step toward the adjustment of any single point in the controversy, either as to the amount that should be paid to the railway companies from year to year or as to the basis on which the compensation ought to be ascertained.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTING. Was there not some recent report in favor of the so-called space system?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes, sir. What commission?

Mr. HUSTING. Some of the commissions or all of them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Some of them have. Some of them have not. The last commission, which is known generally as the Bourne Commission, because he happened to be chairman of the committee at the time it was organized, reported specifically in favor of the space basis. Others have reported in favor of the weight basis; two of them, I think, reported in favor of a combination of the two. But the space basis as compared with the weight basis is still in violent controversy. Some people, very good people, too, believe in it. Other people do not believe in it.

The railways as a whole are very much opposed to it, as is evidenced by the hearings. Many of the experts who have no interest in the matter on either side are opposed to it. Some are in favor of it. I venture to say that there are not to exceed one-half dozen Senators on this floor who at this moment are prepared to declare either for or against it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the Post Office Department itself concedes that in the case of small railroads carrying pouch mail the space system would not do at all, and they had to provide an exception from that system for that portion of the mail.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is quite true; but I am not here to espouse either basis. I have an opinion with regard to the matter, but I confess it is an opinion upon which I would not dare to ask the Senate to act. It is an opinion which I would not venture to impose either upon the Post Office Department or the railways.

My amendment does not attack the weight basis; it does not attack the space basis. It simply declares that we are not qualified to determine what the compensation of the railway or the carriers who transport mail should be. I do not believe there are many Senators who have given to this subject more continuous study than myself. I have tried to make it an impartial study. But if I were asked to declare what the railway companies of this country should receive for the service they render the Government I would be compelled to say that I do not know. My amendment proceeds upon the hypothesis that, whether we take the weight basis or the space basis, there is another tribunal organized for the specific purpose of ascertaining a fair reward or rate that the railway companies ought to enjoy or receive for their service, and to that tribunal we ought to submit the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wanted to ask the Senator whether he is offering his amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment? I have not understood exactly the situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. There are parts of the Senate committee amendment which are so far removed from the subject that I am discussing and which my amendment embraces that I have not offered my amendment as a substitute for the entire committee amendment. I have offered it for a part of the committee amendment, and that part is specified in the beginning of my amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not fully understand the difference between the Senator's proposition and the proposition of the committee, which is also before the Senate. Each seems to provide that an investigation shall be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, that hearings shall be had, and that pending those hearings no change shall be made in the present law. Is that correct?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senate committee amendment proposes a change in the present law, which I do not disturb, but the difference between the Senate committee amendment and the House bill as well, because they are both open to the same objection, and my amendment is this. Both the House bill and the Senate committee refer the subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an investigation and report, and then Congress can accept the report or can reject it. There will be nothing whatsoever settled. Our past experience demonstrates, if it proves anything, that we will not necessarily accept the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The subject will still be open for debate and decision; Congress will still be called upon to determine what rate is fair and reasonable; whereas my amendment puts the Government of the United States in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, precisely as we put every citizen of the United States in the hands of that commission, and when the commission declares what is reasonable compensation it binds not only the railway companies but binds the United States as well, and that is thereafter the compensation to be paid for the service rendered. That is the difference, and that difference is as wide as the sea. There is nothing at all settled either by the House provision or by the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. THOMAS rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. It was precisely that defect in the Senate committee amendment to which my amendment was directed, but I am so much better satisfied with the amendment more carefully prepared by the Senator than with mine that I shall support his amendment with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado would do just exactly what I propose. It is not worked out in quite as much detail. My purpose is to commit this subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, believing that it will act fairly both for the Government and for the railways, and when it does act the compensation will be paid and the great, vexatious controversy will be removed from Congress.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I got the impression from the reading of the Senator's amendment that it contemplated hearings and the possibility that the rate, instead of being a flat rate for the whole country and all railroads, might vary with different railroads and in different sections.

Mr. CUMMINS. That depends entirely upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. In my judgment, we can not compel any railroad company by any form of words that we may use to render a service to the Government for less than a fair compension. We ought not to require it if we could, and we could not require it if we would. Therefore, when this subject comes before the Interstate Commerce Commission—as it would come under my amendment—it investigates the whole subject and every railway and lays down and establishes a rate for the transportation of mail.

I hope Senators will not confound the compensation we pay to the carrier and the compensation which the Government exacts from the public for transportation. We can do what we please with regard to the latter. We can send mail throughout the whole country for nothing if we desire to do it. We may continue the most unjust and indefensible subsidy to second-class matter and lose $60,000,000 every year in carrying this matter. We can continue that if we will, but when the Government comes to deal with a railway company then it must pay a fair, reasonable compensation for the service it demands. It ought not to pay more, and under the law the railway company can not be compelled to accept less.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator from Iowa hold that the Interstate Commerce Commission would be more inclined to deal justly with the carrier than Congress, whose duty and whose right it is, and which it has exercised from time immemorial, to fix these rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so, Mr. President. Congress can not fix a rate. We do not know enough to fix the rate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As to the purpose, as I understand it, the Interstate Commerce Commission would gather the data upon which Congress could base its conclusions. I can not see how the Senator can reason it out so as to reach the conclusion that Congress would be less likely to do its duty to the railroad companies than the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing the rate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope that both Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission have an eye single to the public welfare, but the proposal of the House as well as the Senate committee is that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall investigate and make a report. It will then be for Congress to fix a rate. It may accept the report of the commission, it may not, and nothing whatsoever is settled.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the conclusion of the Interstate Commerce Commission is correct, if it is fair, if it is just——

Mr. CUMMINS. Who is to determine that?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. Well, I want the commission to determine it, because I think we ought to have the same confidence in the commission with respect to the service which we require as a Government that we compel the citizens of this country to have in the establishment of rates which they must pay. Suppose the interstate-commerce act provided that before the commission fixed any rate it should report to Congress, and then we should legislate upon the question and either establish the rate or some other, does the Senator from Mississippi think that would be an efficient regulation of transportation?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The question of railroad rate regulation is a matter of almost infinite detail, while the question of railroad mail pay has been worked out with fair success by the Congress. I understand that Congress has universally from time immemorial fixed the rate for carrying the mails, and I have not seen any marked abuse of that function to the detriment of the railroad companies.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a matter of fact, Congress has not fixed the rate, and it does not fix the rate in this bill for all practical purposes. Let me point that out. Take the provisions of the House bill. These provisions fix a certain rate per mile for a certain space. The language or the phraseology of the act is not exceeding a certain sum per mile. But the act immediately proceeds to give the Postmaster General authority to either increase the amount or decrease it. So the legislation proposed by the House in effect gives to the Potsmaster General absolute, uncontrolled discretion with respect to railway mail pay, and the limitation will be of no avail whatsoever.

Moreover, the House provision requires the railway companies to accept whatever rate may be fixed by the Postmaster General, and if they do not accept they are to be fined $5,000 every day. To me a provision of this sort is more objectionable than the despotism of any country on earth. I can not understand how it can be vindicated or justified by anyone; but what I am now saying does not apply to the Senate committee, because it has attempted to eliminate those provisions from the House bill.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I have not examined the Senator's amendment. Does it provide for an appeal from the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission the same as in rate-making cases?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; it is so intended.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We could not hear the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no provision in the present law——

Mr. NELSON. I will repeat my question, so that the Senator from Mississippi may understand it. I asked whether the amendment provides for an appeal in this case as in other rate-making cases before the Interstate Commerce Commission? Is there an appeal to the courts?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it would permit the same review, although the present law does not permit an appeal. Under the present interstate-commerce law if the rates are confiscatory the railway companies can bring a suit for an injunction and in that way the validity of the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission is tested, but under the present law the shipper has no remedy whatever. The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the shipper is final.

Mr. NELSON. I am aware of that fact, but here is the point. In an ordinary rate-making case there may be an issue between the railroad company and the Interstate Commerce Commission as to whether the order of the commission is valid and not confiscatory.

Now, take this case. Suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission fixes the rate for the transportation of mail and the railroads object to it and say the rate is not sufficiently high, that it is not compensatory, in other words, does the Senator's amendment provide for an appeal in such a case?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not an appeal. There is no such thing, as I understand it.

Mr. NELSON. I am using the term in a general sense. I mean does it provide for a review by the court?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not specifically. There would be the same remedy precisely under my amendment for the railway companies that now exists in the case of the establishment of a rate for a private shipper.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator's amendment provide for that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so. It is provided for in just the same way the present law does.

I now recur to the question that was debated and considered principally in the various investigations which I referred to a moment ago. In all of them the principal question, the principal dispute concerned the merit of the space basis as compared to the weight basis. My amendment does not involve that dispute at all. The Interstate Commerce Commission will be at perfect liberty to adopt the one basis or the other or adopt both. If we were to enter upon an inquiry and debate here respecting the merits of the space basis as compared with the weight basis it would be never ending.

I venture to say that within the last 38 years there have been 10,000 pages of testimony taken before the various committees and various commissions relating to that one question. But after you have settled that issue you have settled nothing, so far as compensation is concerned, for if you adopt a weight basis you must then attach a certain charge for a certain weight of mail. If you adopt the space basis you must also attach a certain charge for carrying a certain car a certain distance. So the real question in which we are interested is not elucidated by the adoption of the one basis or the other.

At any rate, my amendment does not purport or attempt to settle that very difficult and intricate question, and I repeat that I do not believe there are a half a dozen Senators in our whole body who are competent now to decide that first controversy, namely, whether the standard should be space or weight. The reasons given on either side are very persuasive and it is not an easy matter to determine; but suppose we had determined in favor of weight, how much, then, should be charged to carry a hundredweight of mail? Is there a Senator here who knows? No; there is not one. If we adopt the space basis, how much should we pay the railway companies for carrying a 60-foot car a mile? The House bill attempts to settle that, or, at least, it establishes a maximum rate; but I ask again whether there is a Senator here who knows and is willing to declare by his vote how much the railway companies ought to receive for carrying a car 40 feet or 60 feet in length a mile?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. I ask the Senator if he does not think the rate paid by packers and others who have privately owned cars and run them over the railroads, the amount per foot per mile that they pay, might furnish some criterion of what the Government should pay?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think so. I have examined the testimony with a great deal of care, and there are many suggestions, although I may say in passing that the testimony which is devoted to the proper charge per mile for a railway mail car is almost negligible as compared with the testimony on the merits of the two bases. But throughout all this testimony there is now and then a suggestion as to the proper comparison. Some have compared it with the fast freight; some have compared it with express matter; some have compared it with passenger space; but I am bound to say, after the most deliberate and reflective study, I do not know what it ought to be. It may very well be that the sum fixed by the House bill is altogether too large. It may be that it is altogether too small. It is a subject that we are not qualified to vote upon, any more than we are qualified to vote upon a freight rate from New York to Chicago on coal, meat, wheat, or any other commodity which may be transported from one part of the country to another.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator from Iowa is in doubt as to just what the rate should be, and I can sympathize with him in that respect. I think the committee generally had no thought as to what the rate should be, but favored referring the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, in order that they might thrash it out. However, as to the system, whether the rate shall be determined on a basis of space or weight, what is the Senator's opinion on that?

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were doing it myself—although I said a few moments ago that I would not venture to ask this Government to take the course which my opinion might now suggest—I would have a combination of both.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say for myself that my first impression was when the matter was before the committee that the rate should be governed by weight. It seemed to me that that was the practical and sensible solution of the matter. Afterwards, however, during the course of the hearings before the committee, the Senator from Iowa, who is a member of it, will recall that the presidents of a number of farmers' granges throughout the country appeared before the committee and with the most remarkable unanimity pressed the weight system; they had no thought of the space system. I asked a couple of those gentlemen, who were presidents of granges, how it was that they with such uniformity were pressing the weight system, and finally, after a great deal of circumlocution, they admitted, in answer to my question, that presidents and other officials of railroads had even deigned to come before the farmers' granges and to tell the farmers it was their incumbent duty to come down before the Post Office Committee, which was formulating this bill, and to advocate the weight basis as against the space basis.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, I will say that I think he is at fault in his recollection of just exactly what those gentlemen said. They were here not asking for the weight system but asking that this matter be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is true; but they said that their primary motive was to secure the adoption of the weight system. I asked them, "How is it that you gentlemen have left your occupation of agriculture, of the tillage of the earth in order that it may bring forth bountiful crops, and now project yourselves into this intricate problem?" "Well," they said, "it is very plain to the presidents of the agricultural granges. The railroad presidents told us that it was our duty to come here and make known our desires and their desires. They further told us, as a reason for it, that if the space system were adopted the railroads were going to charge every farmer higher freight rates for his potatoes and his wheat." So these voracious creatures, fattened to richness, finally made up their minds that the only way to lambaste the Congress of the United States into their way of thinking was to go to the farmers and to inspire them to tell the Senate of the United States that, if they did not adopt this method, there would be an increased rate imposed on their potatoes, on their corn, and on every other commodity which they raise. That made me very quickly transfer my adherence from the weight system to the space system; and I believe to-day there is every reason for it in justice, and every reason in the experience of other countries; for, so far as I have examined the subject, every country which has tried the space system has adopted that instead of the weight system. The attitude of the unscrupulous men who went to these dependent and helpless farmers—whose crops and products of the earth, however much they may raise, amount to nothing unless they can transport them to the market of the consumer—made me believe that our true course was to stand for the space basis instead of the weight basis.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can understand the deep feeling of the Senator from New Jersey on that question and how conclusive the reason that he now gives is for his change of mind. I can see, of course, how conclusive the misconduct on the part of the railway companies in bringing these helpless and innocent farmers here to sustain their theory is in favor of the space basis; but speaking seriously it does not appeal to me in that way any more than the similar effort—quite as indefensible—made by the Post Office Department itself in sending out telegrams to all postmasters of the country to forward dispatches to all Senators asking them to sustain the Post Office Department in its proposal as to railway-mail pay and as to rural mail routes. I think both campaigns are overworked; I think both are to be criticized; and I do not criticize one any more than the other; but really I am unable to see how the suggestion just made by the Senator from New Jersey affects my proposal that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall be given the authority to fix the compensation for the Government, exactly as it fixes the compensation for me or for him.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to say that I never understood that this provision proposed to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to absolutely fix the compensation, but that it proposed to refer the whole subject to them, their action to be submitted for ratification to the Congress of the United States. It seemed to me that the wisdom of the reference was that such questions are in the line of their business. They have no conventions to attend, as the Senator from Iowa has and as I have; their minds are undivided and fixed on this one proposition. Hence they can deliberate with infinitely more wisdom and justice than can any of the rest of us. So I agree to that.

The Senator refers to the Post Office Department having sent out telegrams to influence the action of Congress in favor of their contention. I was not aware that the Postmaster General took such action; but there was a gentleman in a lower official position who did presume to send letters to me and to other Senators and to many other persons, telling them what their path of duty was. I recall that for one I was very rebellious at his suggestion, and I feel so yet. I feel that there should be some example made in the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it seems to me that the natural effect ought to have been a reconversion of the Senator from New Jersey to the weight basis. If that sort of influence had the effect of changing him from the weight to the space basis, the other instance of lobbying ought to have returned him to the weight basis; but I do not believe the Senator from New Jersey was here when my amendment was read.

I am discussing an amendment that I have proposed which is intended to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with the authority to say—and to say in an authoritative way—what the compensation shall be. I am not discussing the merits of the weight basis as compared with the space basis. I would not venture, as I have repeated now twice, to express an opinion upon that subject that I should expect to govern either my fellow Senators or to govern the Post Office Department. I am not well enough satisfied upon that point to have a fixed opinion; and much less have I any opinion as to the amount that ought to be paid for space, if that be the standard adopted.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not think any member of the committee had that thought.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure that statement in itself is the most potent argument for my amendment that I have heard.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wish to state to the Senator from New Jersey that the committee proposition was to refer this matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, directing that body to report back to Congress as early as possible, just as he thought; whereas the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa is to refer the proposition, as I understand, to the Interstate Commerce Commission with full authority to act finally in the matter, and to determine what is reasonable and just in the way of rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from New Jersey seems to have been a little confused.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Jersey was not present when my amendment was read.

Mr. President, I want to call attention just for a moment to the difference between the House provision and the Senate committee amendment. The House bill adopts the space basis; fixes a maximum compensation; gives the Postmaster General authority to both increase and reduce that compensation; gives him the power to fine the carriers if they do not obey his directions; compels the railways to render the service; and for every violation they are to be fined not exceeding $5,000. Finally, either the Postmaster General or the railways, represented by at least 51 per cent of the mileage, may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a report. It also provides for a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then, after the commission reports, the Postmaster General is to fix whatsoever rate he desires. That is the House bill.

The Senate committee amendment strikes all that out; continues the present plan, provides for annual weighing, if the railway companies will pay the expense, under the direction of the Postmaster General; requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to hold hearings on the whole subject, and to report to Congress.

If that amendment were to prevail, there would be no rate fixed until Congress had at some future time acted upon the subject. As I remarked a few moments ago, knowing what I do about the disposition of Members of the Senate, at any rate, their independence, their disinclination to follow leadership, I would have no hope that the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission would receive more than a passing glance, just exactly as every other commission which we have created reports to Congress, and its report lies in the archives of the body until it is covered with the dust of years, without a single reader.

How many Senators ever read the report made by the distinguished commission which I mentioned a few moments ago, created in 1911, I think—possibly in 1910—a joint committee of the other House and of the Senate; a committee which spent two years or more in the most careful inquiry ever carried forward respecting the subject? I will venture to say that there are not a half dozen Senators in this body who ever read the report; that there are not a dozen who now know what is in that report. It will be just so with the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Are we to conclude that the Senator's argument is leading him to the point where he thinks commissions created by Congress ought to direct Congress in its legislation? For instance, if a tariff commission shall be created, does the Senator from Iowa think that Congress ought to delegate to that commission the right to fix tariff rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator from Mississippi asking me the question?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was asking the Senator that question. I take it the purpose of the Senator's argument is to show that the mere investigation of this commission and its reporting to Congress would have no effect upon the minds of the Congress in legislating upon this question.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The question of the tariff is quite as intricate and difficult of solution, it seems to me, as is the fixing of railroad rates; Congress, I hardly think, will delegate the function or power to a commission to fix the tariff; yet I can see where great advantage would be derived by the creation of a nonpartisan commission charged with the duty of making a scientific investigation of the tariff question and reporting the result of its investigation to Congress to assist and guide the Congress in legislating. The same, I think, would be true with reference to any action of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon this question, leaving then to Congress, the representatives of the people, to finally determine whether the rates are just or unjust. I for one think that one of the real dangers to the future of this Government and the permanency of our institutions is the delegation of legislative authority to bureaus and commissions. The closer we keep the Government to the people, the more responsive will the Government be to the public judgment. The farther the Government is removed from the ballot box, the more liable are its functions to be prostituted to private personal ends.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, we have not delegated legislative authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We can not delegate legislative authority to any commission or to any body of men.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment, I trust the Senator will allow me to answer him before he proceeds. If there is no difference between a tariff commission and the Interstate Commerce Commission, there is much force to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I did not say that there was no difference.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not yield just now. I will ask the Senator to allow me to answer him.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I merely desired to ask that the Senator would quote me correctly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to answer the Senator from Mississippi before he proceeds with further suggestions. There is a vast difference between a tariff commission, as we understand it, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. If we could establish for a tariff commission a standard, a rule, by which the commission could determine what our import duties should be, I, for one, would be very glad to do it. If a Republican majority were in possession of Congress, that standard would be adequate protection, the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, or some other rule of that character. If we could do that, then I would be content to see a tariff commission determine what the duties should be; but if a Democratic majority is in possession of Congress, it will not accede to that rule; it has another rule; and therefore it is impossible to remove the subject of a tariff from politics, because the standard applied is different as majorities come and go, and all that we can secure from a tariff commission is an investigation and a report of facts, so that we can take a rule—whatever rule may recommend itself to Congress at the time the question is before us—and apply it to those facts.

It is not so with the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have established a rule—a standard—for the Interstate Commerce Commission. It does not exercise legislative authority; it does not exercise judicial authority, although it has what is sometimes akin to judicial authority. We have declared that the railway companies shall charge the people of this country for the service rendered a fair and reasonable and nondiscriminatory rate.

That is our rule; and we have said to the commission, "Take the facts in any particular instance; apply this rule to the facts; and declare what is a reasonable nondiscriminatory rate or practice." We do not ask Congress to review the application of this rule to the business of the country. We understand perfectly that we are incompetent—and I say that without any disparagement—to apply the rule to the facts even though the facts are easily gathered and understood. For instance, suppose that at the time of the application of the railway companies, first made in 1910 and repeated or renewed in 1913, for an increase of an average of 5 per cent upon their rates, the law had been that the commission should inquire into the facts and report to Congress, into what chaos we would have been plunged. Such an arrangement would be utterly impossible; and it is just so with the railway-mail proposition. We are not qualified, by reason of our training, or want of training, and by reason of our absorption in a thousand other duties, to apply the rule to the facts.

My amendment simply lays down the proposition—and no one can complain of it, I am sure—that the railways of this country shall carry the mails, in so far as they are required to carry them, for a fair and reasonable compensation. No one will dispute that. Now, who is to determine what is a fair and reasonable compensation? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] says that that must be determined by Congress. Heretofore it has been determined by the Postmaster General. I believe it ought to be determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission. For instance——

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether he does not see some distinction in the situation? The Interstate Commerce Commission determines rates as between private individuals and the common carriers. The question now before the Senate is a question of making a contract between the United States itself and the common carriers. Is it a matter that should be submitted to a commission to determine, or is it purely a matter of contract with the railroad company, to be executed by the United States through its officers?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Wisconsin misunderstands both the House bill and the Senate committee amendment or I misunderstand them. It is not a question of contract at all. Neither bill nor amendment provides for a contract with the railway companies; and in that respect I am in entire sympathy with both the House bill and the Senate committee amendment. I do not believe it ought to be a matter of contract. I think the railways of this country, by virtue of their organization and by the service which they proclaim, are bound to carry the mails if tendered by the Government, just as they are bound to carry passengers and freight when required by proper tender, and their compensation for the service ought not to be fixed by any contract; it ought to be fixed upon precisely the same basis as the compensation for every other service is fixed.

I will come to a view of the matter taken by the Postmaster General very soon. It will raise a very difficult and very interesting question, and it is somewhat akin to the view that may be inferred from the question put by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING]. I may as well do that now. It will be, I think, logical before passing to a further discussion of the specific questions raised by my amendment to refer to a fundamental proposition which Congress must adjust and which it must adjust now. It can not postpone the settlement of the question I am about to state.

There are two conflicting views with regard to the relation between the Government and the common carriers or the railways of the country. One view is well expressed in a report made by the Postmaster General for the year ending June 30, 1913, which I take the liberty of quoting. It is found on pages 21 and 22:

> The determination of what shall be the basis for ascertaining a fair rate of compensation for carrying the mails is not free from difficulties. From a careful consideration of the subject it becomes evident that the carriage of the mails by the railroad companies for the Government can not be considered as of the same character of service as that performed by them as common carriers for the general public. The railroads have received certain benefits from the States from which they derive their corporate existence—

And, in passing, I may say it is plain that the Postmaster General there refers to the franchise of a corporation under the law of a particular State—> and their interstate commerce is subject to the regulation of the Federal Government. Some of them have received substantial aid from the Federal Government by grants of lands and otherwise. They are declared by law to be post roads. As mail carriers they are agencies of the Post Office Department and are performing a governmental function. The postal business is not carried on by the Government for profit but in furtherance of the constitutional power to establish post offices and post roads under which it furnishes postal facilities to all of its citizens. The railroads, therefore, may not deal with the Government as they would with a shipper who uses their facilities as a common carrier for profit or for some special advantage. Furthermore, the general business which sustains a railroad is to a large extent dependent upon the mails and their certain and expeditious transportation, and the carriage of the mails by the railroad contributes to its prosperity to an extent and in a manner which does not obtain for any other class of its business. From these and other considerations it follows that rates for carrying the mails on railroads should be less than those which might be fixed for commercial business.

> When the data in hand and now being secured by the department are thoroughly considered and analyzed the Postmaster General will lay before the appropriate committees of Congress the conclusions reached as to what will be just and adequate compensation for all services which the railroads are rendering or will be called upon to render the Government for mail transportation.

Mr. President, as I remarked a moment ago, this extract presents a fundamental inquiry which we must settle in the passage of this bill. I dissent wholly and completely from the view expressed by the Postmaster General. I do not believe that the railway companies can be compelled to carry the mail for less than a fair compensation for the service. I think any attempt of that sort would be unconstitutional; and, furthermore—which is of even more importance—I believe it would be unwise in the last degree for the Government to attempt to require the railways of the country to carry the mails for less than a fair compensation, for the reason that in just so much as the Government falls short of paying the railways that proportion of a lawful revenue, it must require the shippers of the country to supply the deficit; and in just so much as the Government overpays the railways, in just so much are the private shippers of the country relieved of a burden which they ought to bear, or which the commerce of the country ought to bear.

I do not intend to dwell at any considerable length upon the constitutional aspect of the case, although the whole House bill is founded upon the assumption that, if the Government desired to do it, it could compel the railways of the country to carry the mails for nothing; and, indeed, if there is not to be a fair compensation paid, fixed in some judicious and satisfactory way, I would vastly rather see the railways compelled to render the entire service without any compensation at all, and distribute the burden among the people of the country who have occasion to use the railways for commercial or business purposes.

But I am unalterably opposed to the whole theory. The railway companies of this country are under no obligation to carry the mails other than the obligation which arises out of their function as common carriers, out of the power and authority of Congress to declare their railways post roads; and the Government of the United States can no more require a railway to carry the mails for less than adequate compensation than can Congress require the railways to render service to a private shipper for less than a fair and reasonable compensation. There is no other relation than that; and the inevitable consequence of the view taken by some of the advocates of the House provision will be in the end to give the railways of this country vastly more than fair compensation. I have been impressed with the conclusion that they are getting more now than they ought to have, although the compensation is not either fairly or decently distributed among the several common carriers. In my judgment—although it is not one upon which I would be willing to act as a legislator—some of the railway companies receive more than they ought to receive and some of them are receiving far less than fair compensation.

But my real objection to the view taken by the Postmaster General—and that is, in a way, found in all the provisions of the House bill—is this: The carriers of this country are now being regulated along perfectly well-known lines. Our experiment in controlling the rates of the railways of this country has advanced to a point where the rules which determine the adjustment are well known, however difficult they may be of application.

I am not prepared to abandon the experiment. I believe it is successful—as successful as we find any other effort in dealing with a most complicated and difficult system. The rule is this, as now well understood everywhere: That a railway is entitled to rates that will reimburse it for maintenance and operation, preserving the property in the same condition or in as good condition as when the service began. It is entitled to its fixed charges, its taxes, its assessments—everything that the law imposes upon the property and that must be paid. It is entitled, then, to a surplus—there may be a little difference about the extent of the surplus—a surplus that may be applied to reasonable dividends upon its stock and that will also accumulate a fair sum to tide over an unfortunate or unsatisfactory year. Whenever the Interstate Commerce Commission comes to ascertain whether or not a given rate or system of rates is fair and reasonable, that is the rule to be applied—now conceded by everybody.

With regard to this matter, the railways which carry the mail must have that revenue. They ought not to have more, but they must have enough to satisfy these lawful demands; and whatever the Government does not pay for the transportation of the mails the people of the country must pay. If we adopt a system under which the railways are underpaid, the railways are not ultimately injured. They do not sacrifice anything. They simply have credit in the grand accounting made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or, to put it on the other side of the ledger, they are charged with what they receive from the Government, and the general public must make up whatever is required to enable them to pay the cost of maintenance and operation, their fixed charges, and fair return upon the value of the property.

Is it not perfectly obvious that the tribunal which is to make that accounting, which is to determine and which does determine from year to year, from time to time, what shall be the rates to be paid by the commodities which are transported from day to day, the tribunal which must ultimately say whether the rates on these articles are adequate or not, should also have the authority to say what the Government shall pay for the transportation of its mails? I repeat that I have been inclined to think that the Government pays too much; but it may not be so. I am not competent to judge. But it is in the highest degree illogical and absurd to say that the Postmaster General shall determine what the Government shall pay for the transportation of the mails, and then allow the Interstate Commerce Commission to make up what is required for the purposes I have described by increasing the rates upon the ordinary commerce of the land.

I see that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] is giving me his attention; and I want to say to him again that the question I am discussing does not involve the space basis or the weight basis. I do not care which basis the Interstate Commerce Commission adopts. I want it to adopt whichever basis it finds most accurate or convenient in order to arrive at a just conclusion with respect to what fair compensation shall be. But I do most earnestly insist that the same tribunal which fixes the rates for the great public shall fix the rates for that public organized in a Government.

We disparage the Interstate Commerce Commission; it is a distinct reflection upon its capacity to withhold from it the power to do for our country in a collective capacity what we give it authority to do for us in an individual capacity.

Why is the Government of the United States entitled to more consideration than the farmer, who must appeal to the commission to ascertain at what rate his grain shall be shipped from his fields to a market? There is no reason, and it would relieve the whole question of the uncertainties which have surrounded it now for more than 30 years.

It is manifest, Mr. President, that the compensation for the Government service must be determined in one of the following ways:

First. By the railways. We can not adopt this view. I do not even want to give the railways the right which they now have, with regard to the general public, of fixing rates in the first instance. Everybody knows that when the amendments to the interstate commerce law in 1910 were being debated, I urged, with all the power I had, the policy of giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to initiate rates. I think it ought to initiate all the rates of the country. We never will have a harmonious, well-adjusted, fair system until the commission shall take up the question as it concerns all the railways of the country and all the traffic of the country and establishes rate sheets of its own. I do not believe in the present policy of authorizing the railroad companies to initiate rates, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission only the authority to suspend them and to enter upon a hearing that may finally result in either reducing them or raising them; and I apply precisely the same principle to the railway-mail pay. This tribunal should determine the question in a proceeding—not a hearing, but a proceeding—begun by the Postmaster General, in which he shall set forth the service which he desires, the conditions under which it is to be rendered, and what he believes to be a reasonable compensation for it, answered by the railway companies, thus making an issue, an adversary proceeding, that can go forward to final conclusion with just as much certainty as can any proceeding that is brought at the present time by individuals or associations.

Second. By the Post Office Department. This would be unwise, for the interest of the Postmaster General is too direct and immediate. It would be the equivalent of permitting the purchaser to fix the price of the thing he buys. I do not believe in it. I have no word of criticism upon the Post Office Department; certainly none upon the present Postmaster General. I am quite ready to grant that he is an able, energetic man. He is dreaming of just one thing, I assume, or one thing and a correlated thing—of rendering good service to the people of this country and requiring the railroad companies to render their service for the smallest possible amount. I do not think he cares whether it is compensatory or not, any more than I would care, if I were a private shipper, whether a rate I could obtain was compensatory or not. There are certain considerations which always rise above or fall below—I do not care which—these ethical rules. No man is a good judge in his own case. No man may be expected to render a just decision if his own interest or welfare is inseparably connected with the outcome.

I therefore am not willing to trust the Postmaster General with the power to fix rates, nor do I believe that any Senator ought to be willing to intrust him with that power, for there is no correction of his judgment; there is no recourse to the courts; nor can any railway company venture to disobey his order, for the penalty is a fine of $5,000 each day, imposed by the Postmaster General himself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is there any more reason, in principle, why the Government should insist by legislation that the Postmaster General shall fix the amount that the Government shall pay for carrying the mails than for Congress to insist that the Secretary of War shall fix the charges for transporting the Army and all the munitions for the Army?

Mr. CUMMINS. None whatever. It is precisely the same thing. Of course, there are some railroads which, by virtue of their incorporation, are under a contractual obligation to the Government to do certain things at a certain price, or at a reduction below a common or given rate, but it would be just as fair to say that every railroad in the country should carry anything for the Government in any way, it matters not whether it is carried in a freight car or a passenger car, and that the particular officer of the Government interested in it should fix the compensation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Materials for all the public buildings, for instance.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

The third function or department of the Government that might fix the rate is Congress.

I do not believe that Congress is competent to do it, simply because it is a life study. It requires the training of years; and in this particular instance a just compensation for carrying the mails involves the inquiry as to just compensation for carrying all other commodities, for the aggregate revenue must accomplish a certain object, and it is utterly impossible to fix one without reference to the other. For instance, take the passenger rate. Mails are carried on passenger trains, ordinarily; and there has been an effort made to compare the compensation to be paid for carrying mails with the compensation received by the railways for carrying passengers. I think there is a fair basis for that comparison. It is not perfect. The parallel is not exact, but there is a fair basis for it. But suppose that the Interstate Commerce Commission believed that the passenger fare was too high or too low, as the case might be. If we are to adjust railway-mail pay upon the earnings from that source, then the power that fixes the mail pay must have the power also to fix the passenger fare.

Senators will remember that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in deciding the famous Advance-Rate case, suggested, and in fact afterwards held, that some passenger rates were too low, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has increased certain passenger rates. I know of a case in which it has divided a State into three or four parts and allowed a certain passenger fare in one part and a certain different passenger fare in another. It is obvious—I only mention these things to show—that Congress can not fairly and intelligently determine what ought to be paid. It may be that of the grand aggregate revenue we ought not to pay more than fifty millions, instead of sixty. It may be that we ought to pay seventy, instead of sixty, in order to relieve those who are now bearing more than their share of the tax that we ordinarily know as railroad rates.

Fourth—and it is the only other resort—is the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is organized for the very purpose of ascertaining what is a reasonable compensation for the services of common carriers. In a high degree it acts judicially. It is equipped with all the facilities for making such investigation. Its jurisdiction would be complete, and it could raise or lower rates on commodities of commerce, and thus establish true relations between the various services.

The fitness of the commission to deal with the subject is recognized by both the House and the Senate committee. The House proposes a reference, under certain circumstances, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the report of the commission to be simply advisory to the Postmaster General. The Senate committee amendment proposes a reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, its report to be simply advisory to Congress. I invoke the provisions in both instances as showing that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the body to which men look for the ascertainment and the establishment of railway rates.

The only objection which can be urged to the amendment I have proposed is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is already overworked. I grant that we have already imposed upon the commission more labor than its members can well perform; but the way in which to remove that objection is not to deny the commission its just authority. It is not to withhold from it a power which it can exercise vastly better than can any other body in the country. It is either to take from it some of the work which we have imposed upon it, and which we ought not to have imposed upon it, or to enlarge the commission so that it can adequately perform its full duty.

I sincerely hope that this obstacle, which is temporary in its character, can be removed. It must not be enduring, or the commission will fail to perform the great functions which the people expect it to perform. With the removal of that objection, I appeal to Senators that if we want to do justice, as I am sure we do; if we desire to pay for the transportation of our mails a fair compensation, neither more nor less; if we want to remove from the Halls of Congress a vexatious controversy which has now raged for nearly 40 years, we ought to clothe the Interstate Commerce Commission with the power I have suggested by passing the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him if he does not think there are other features of the Senate committee amendment that ought also to be amended? There seems to be a provision for reweighing to be had on those lines where the railroads wish it, and not a reweighing on those lines where the railroads do not ask it. I favor letting the Interstate Commerce Commission pass upon these rates. We do not know what they ought to be. We can not learn unless we stop acting as Senators and spend a few years in studying the question. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been selected to consider such questions and have employed an able body of men, the ablest men, whose whole time is given to studying rates. What we wish is to pay the railroads a reasonable and fair compensation, no more and no less, but there seem to be limitations in the amendment of the Senate committee as to the mode of weighing and other things of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have not brought those things to the attention of the Senate because my amendment does not embrace those subjects. They are open, of course, to amendment. I have not considered the question of adjustment suggested by the Senator from Georgia with sufficient care to have a final opinion upon it worthy of being expressed, but after the adoption of my amendment all such questions are open to the Senate for consideration.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am greatly impressed with the Senator's presentation of the reasons upon which his amendment is based, and particularly with the necessity of the adjustment or settlement of this difficult problem by those who are presumably better qualified to do it than any others. The subject is altogether too complicated and too difficult for a layman to properly determine, and, like a great many other subjects which come before us for final determination, we must, if we would do our duty properly, secure the best possible assistance from the best possible sources.

I have read, not perhaps as carefully as I should have done, but I have read with some care, the testimony which has been submitted by some of the various investigating committees which have had the responsibility of inquiring into and reaching a conclusion concerning the basis of railway mail pay and the rate of such pay after the basis has been determined. While I have some opinions upon the subject, they are not sufficiently grounded upon a knowledge of all the facts of the situation to justify me in presenting them as a basis of the vote that I might cast upon this question unless, of course, it becomes necessary to do it as a part of the discharge of my duties as a Senator.

When we consider that running through a number of years several successive bodies and officials have given their best investigation and thought to the subject, have made reports upon the subject which have not been entirely uniform, and that perhaps the majority of the Members of this body have not had the time or the inclination to read the reports, to say nothing of the testimony upon which they are based; and when we have a commission charged with the duty of regulating and passing upon railway matters of which this is one, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa furnishes the best if not the only solution of the problem.

I offered an amendment this morning, somewhat crude in its character, because it was drawn hastily, the object of which was to make the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission conclusive when it had been reached, so that after the investigations, hearings, and all other matters that are necessary to reach a conclusion we should not take the time and subject the problem to the delay consequent upon a reconsideration of the matter by still keeping it an open subject of legislation. In other words, when the body to which this question is referred has passed judgment upon it that judgment should be a finality, so far as we are concerned, and we should then legislate with the light given us by that conclusion. Otherwise it would be a meaningless farce, it seems to me, to delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the duty of telling us what a fair method of railway mail pay consists of and then, instead of accepting it, open it for discussion.

I have been told by those who are in favor of the space system that one of the reasons why the railways are anxious to have the question relegated to the Interstate Commerce Commission is the delay which will result from resorting to that method of disposing of it, since after the report shall have been made to Congress the question will be as open and as undetermined as before, and that we can then consider whether the report is based upon specific testimony, whether its conclusions are logical, or whether it is in other respects open to still further consideration before we shall accept it either in part or in its entirety. I can see some force to that. If it be true—and I am neither affirming nor denying it—that the railways of the country are anxious to continue the present system of compensation, then certainly the longer that system can remain in force the better off they will be from their own standpoint.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. They are a unit.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says they are a unit in opinion. I do not dispute that proposition; but if that be true, then after the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have told us what in its judgment is our best method of procedure, if we do not accept it the question is still as open as it ever was, and the old system, which my friend the Senator from New Jersey says is entirely and unanimously acceptable to the railway companies, will continue.

Therefore, as an evidence of earnestness of intention upon our part, I drew the amendment which was presented this afternoon to the consideration of the Senate, and which provides that the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission when made shall be final so far as legislation is concerned on the subject. But the amendment of the Senator from Iowa which he has presented here at considerable length accomplishes in a much better way, I think, the same end, since the Interstate Commerce Commission is endowed, according to my understanding of the law, with the power to consider the question of rates at any time their fairness is challenged after they have been fixed by legislation here.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator certainly does not mean by saying that this rate will be final when it is fixed that Congress could not change it and adopt some different rule?

Mr. THOMAS. No. If we attempted to do that it would not, of course, bind our successors. I think it should be understood and emphasized by some expression in the law that our purpose in submitting this matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission is to secure their best conclusions after a full hearing, and then act upon it instead of receiving it and considering it as a subject of future debate and discussion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand the Senator his proposition is that when they find a rate it will go into effect without further legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the result of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, which makes it superior to the one which I offered. That is one of the aspects of his amendment which I think is better than my own. The railroads should not complain of that method, because they are insisting, according to the statements of members of the committee, upon the Senate committee's substitute for the House provision. If they are sincere in their belief—and I am not questioning it—that the best method of a final determination of the dispute between them and the department is the Interstate Commerce Commission, they certainly can not complain if we insist that when that decision is ascertained it shall be acted upon and that it shall not be a subject of future controversy.

I shall for the present withdraw the amendment which I offered in view of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and the argument he has made upon it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I rise more to get information than to debate the question. I have the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa in my hand. It begins this way:

All common carriers are hereby required to transport such mail matter as may be offered for transportation by the United States in the manner, under the conditions and with the service prescribed by the Postmaster General, and shall be entitled to receive fair and reasonable compensation for such transportation and for the service connected therewith

Then it proceeds to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission is empowered to fix rates, and so forth, of common carriers. We have intrastate common carriers and interstate common carriers. We have a stage line from Jefferson City to Tuscumbia. It carries mail a distance of 25 or 30 miles between the capital of my State and the seat of the adjoining county. Is it the intention to have the Interstate Commerce Commission deal with that?

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Missouri is asking me a question to be answered now, it is my intention. This amendment is not based on or does not invoke the power of Congress under its authority to regulate commerce among the States. It invokes a power that is just as applicable to an intrastate carrier as an interstate carrier. There is no difference in that respect. Of course, the Interstate Commerce Commission is selected as the tribunal, because it is now authorized and empowered to fix rates in common among the States, and therefore it seems to be the fittest body of men to exercise this power.

Mr. STONE. At present the carrying of the mail from Jefferson City to Tuscumbia is let by contract. There are bidders, and the lowest responsible bidder entering into bond is awarded the contract.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me——

Mr. STONE. I should like to know whether it is the purpose of this amendment to have the Interstate Commerce Commission add to all its burdens, already very great, the task of arranging the rate to be fixed for transporting mail over this vast country on routes such as I have indicated.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I answer the question from the standpoint of my amendment.

Mr. STONE. I yield to anyone who can answer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I can answer it from the standpoint of my amendment.

Mr. STONE. It is the Senator's amendment, and I am addressing myself to his amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS If the Postmaster General wants the common carrier between the two points mentioned by the Senator from Missouri to carry the mail, this amendment will apply to him or to it, and the rate for doing it will be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. If the Postmaster General wants to contract to carry the mail, and have the mail carried by some other than a common carrier, it does not prevent the Postmaster General from doing just what he does now in certain instances.

Mr. STONE. Then I understand that a private citizen might underbid the stage line, which is a common carrier between these points, and take the contract. But that still does not answer the question I have in mind or the difficulty that confronts me. There are a great number of common carriers—stage lines, for example—scattered over this country, carrying passengers and express and all that from one point to another. I imagine they amount to thousands in the aggregate. I wonder if it is the intention of this amendment to have the Interstate Commerce Commission make a schedule or a list of all the multitude of common carriers between towns and communities in our several States and fix a rate for all of them.

Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not think the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which framed the original proposition, ever dreamed for a moment—I do not think the idea ever entered the mind of a single member of that committee—that it would apply to anything except railroads, in one form or another.

Mr. STONE. Well, I am speaking to this amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the language of this amendment can be fairly construed to mean what the Senator from Missouri seems to think it does, then I think the author of the amendment would be very glad to change the language so that it could not properly have a construction like that put upon it.

The mail carriers referred to by the Senator from Missouri are on what are known as star routes. Whenever such service is desired an advertisement is published, and there are sent to the department sealed bids for carrying the mails—daily mails, triweekly mails, or whatever the advertisement may call for. A contract is awarded, usually to the lowest responsible bidder, who is required, of course, to give a bond. That is the regulation.

So far as the class of mail referred to by the Senator from Missouri is concerned, I do not quite see how this amendment can be construed as applicable to conditions like that. I do not think it would be quite possible for the Interstate Commerce Commission, as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, to go out all over the country and provide regulations and conditions upon which the mail on these star routes should be carried. I do not think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] intended that that should be the construction.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is entirely with the Postmaster General.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I think.

Mr. STONE. No; it is not with the Postmaster General, begging pardon of my friend.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Missouri is not willing to trust the Postmaster General, I do not know whom he can trust.

Mr. STONE. I beg the pardon of my friend. I am engaging in a debate here that I am very poorly prepared to carry on, for I have just read the provision, and am merely speaking about some things that flash on my thought as I go along. If this provision is added to the bill, whether by the consent of the committee or of the Senate or of Congress, it seems to me that when you say, "All common carriers are hereby required," and so forth, it is not confined to railroads, unless railroads are specified. I am simply suggesting this thought to the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to have a full understanding with the Senator from Missouri about that. It is not confined to railroads by its present language; but the first paragraph says that the common carriers must carry the mails if they are offered, making that a general duty. If, however, the Postmaster General wants to hire somebody else to carry the mails, he has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. STONE. To be sure, he can on the star routes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; certainly he can do so, just as he does now.

Mr. STONE. Conceding that that be true, still, so far as the stage carriers are concerned, the Interstate Commerce Commission must fix the rate at which they must carry, and if A or B wishes to underbid that rate and will give bond to carry the mail he can do so. I understand that; but the point I wished to submit to the Senate for its consideration was whether we thought it advisable to put the task upon the Interstate Commerce Commission of fixing the rate at which the mails shall be carried across the country by local common carriers—not railroads, but all kinds of common carriers of purely local character. I do not know; it may be all right; but it merely struck me, and I wanted to lay that thought before the Senate, that it is designed to impose a very heavy burden upon a very important commission, which seems to me to have all it can well do now in serving the public interests.

There is another consideration to which I desire to call attention and then I shall be through. To turn this matter over to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the manner proposed would be in effect to take from the Postmaster General the duty, the power, the right to make contracts for carrying the mails on railroads or otherwise. We take from one of the great departments of the Government a very important duty which it has exercised from time immemorial; we strip it of that power and confer it upon a commission.

I do not know why that should be done. I do not know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is any better qualified to say what should be charged by a railroad or by any other common carrier for transporting mail from one place to another than is the Post Office Department. That department has had long experience in this business. There have been ups and downs in respect to the administration of that power; but this amendment proposes to take this great administrative power, exercised so long, and, in the main, through the years, I think well exercised, from the Post Office Department, and to turn it over to a commission that has known nothing of it hitherto. It can educate itself in the course of time; it can go into the study of it—a study that has already been made by the Post Office Department for years and years.

Conditions change with time. As time goes along what ought to be charged to-day might not be a proper rate 10 years hence. Our experience in the past has been that rates have been changed from one period to another.

If we are going to take this function away from the department that deals with the subject and turn it over to a commission which was created to deal with something else in the main, then I submit to my friend from Iowa if this is a thought that appeals to him: The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes rates on interstate commerce. We have boards in our States that undertake to perform the same duty within the States for freights and passengers. I emphasize the words "to fix the rates for freights and passengers." Their activities apply to individuals; they prescribe what the individual shall pay to have his cargo transported or what he shall pay for personal transportation from one point to another. That is the business of these commissions, State and National; but here we are dealing with a different question, as I see it. The Government of the United States—and I will apply the same thing in intrastate matters to the governments of the States—has a great organization; it transports freights, mails, and passengers; and I ask if it ought not to be allowed on its own account to make its own contracts on a basis somewhat different from that which the Interstate Commerce Commission or the State commissions prescribe for individuals? It rather seems so to me.

This Government spends tens of millions of dollars for carrying its mails. Is the Government to be put upon the same plane in dealing with that great question as the Senator from Iowa or myself might be put in sending a carload of wheat or of ore or whatever it might be to market? The Government is sovereign; it is over all; it makes the laws; it creates the commissions; and it seems to me it ought to be given a little larger degree of liberty in view of all the circumstances, and should be afforded the opportunity of making even better terms with the transporters of commodities than are fixed by commissions for individuals who transport but little. That is all I have to say.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, with relation to the comment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] as to the power of Congress to deal with an intrastate carrier, as distinguished from an interstate carrier, it would seem to me that the provision of the House bill is at least subject to the same criticism, for that attempts to make no distinction whatever between interstate and intrastate carriers, but deals with all railroads.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not believe that many of the difficulties presented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] would arise, yet I have no desire that the little stage routes of the country should come within the provisions of my amendment. So I ask to insert in the first line of my amendment, after the word "All," the word "railway," so that it will read "All railway common carriers." I suppose I may do that by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, as modified, to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think there was an understanding that there was not to be a vote on the amendment to-night.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If we have reached the point of voting on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, under an agreement reached, I am going to ask the Senate to adjourn until to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and I make that motion.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator move that the Senate adjourn or take a recess?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We can not take a recess, because exercises have already been arranged for to-morrow after the conclusion of the morning business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5863) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Charles H. Bingham from Congressional Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Lock Haven, Pa.

The message also requested the Senate to return to the House the bill (H. R. 15282) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Charles H. Bingham from Congressional Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Lock Haven, Pa.

CHARLES H. BINGHAM.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives for the return of the bill (H. R. 15282) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Charles H. Bingham from Congressional Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Lock Haven, Pa., and, without objection, the order was complied with.

LIGHTHOUSE AT SCITUATE, MASS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5910) authorizing the sale of the lighthouse reservation at Scituate, Mass., which were, on page 1, line 4, after "sell," to insert "and convey"; on page 1, line 14, after "sixteen," to strike out all down to and including "fifty-nine" on page 2, line 2, and insert "pages 182 and 183."

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented memorials of sundry citizens of Jamaica and Stratton, in the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the State Board of Dental Examiners of California, praying for an increase in armaments, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Alameda, Cal., praying for Federal aid in the treatment of tuberculosis, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of the Friends of Irish Freedom, of Lynn, Mass., remonstrating against the execution of the leaders of the Irish revolt, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LANE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Oregon, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 6413) granting an increase of pension to Angelia T. Mosier; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 6414) to authorize mining for metalliferous minerals on Indian reservations; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to ascertain and pay the damages due to George P. Frederick, of Newport, Del., resulting from disinfecting his premises by Government inspectors during the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease in 1914, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agriculture appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 for experiments in breeding, maintenance, and purchase of horses of Arab breed for military purposes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Agriculture appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment providing that on and after July 1, 1916, upon all mail matter of the first class when deposited in any post office or branch post office for delivery within the limits of said post-office delivery district or on any star or rural free-delivery route emanating from said post office the rate of postage shall be 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 10484), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000,000 to establish and operate 10 Army aviation schools in locations to be determined by the Secretary of War to train aviators from the Regular Army and militia and civilian volunteers as reserves, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 16460), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

EASTERN SHORE TRANSPORTATION CO.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15635) for the relief of the Eastern Shore Transportation Co., of Baltimore, Md., which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m., Wednesday, June 21, 1916) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 22, 1916, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1916.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God and our Father, we seek Thy nearer presence in the sacred attitude of prayer and devotion that we may be uplifted and inspired by the warm life-giving currents ever emanating from Thy great heart. We realize that no question is ever settled until it is settled right, and no enactment can be dignified as law without Thine approval. Guide, therefore, this legislative body in all its deliberations that its enactments may be in consonance with Thy plans and purposes. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have 10,000 copies of the bill H. R. 11707, the widows' pension bill, printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to have printed 10,000 copies of the widows' pension bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHARLES H. BINGHAM.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the House passed a House bill authorizing the removal of the remains of the late Charles H. Bingham from the Congressional Cemetery. Two days before that the Senate had passed a similar bill and sent it to the House. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the District of Columbia may be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill, and that it may be considered now with a view of asking for the recall of the House bill from the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the District of Columbia Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill S. 5863, and that the same be considered at this time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 5863) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Charles H. Bingham from Congressional Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Lock Haven, Pa.

Be it enacted, etc., That the health officer of the District of Columbia be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a permit to Charles Bingham for the removal of the remains of his son, the late Charles H. Bingham, from Congressional Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Lock Haven, Pa., but such permit shall not be issued until there has been filed in the health department of the District of Columbia a permit from the proper governmental authorities at the place where said cemetery is located, authorizing the interment there of said remains.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Senate be requested to return to the House the bill H. R. 15282.

The motion was agreed to.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. In the Congressional News of June 15, an antipreparedness publication, I find published a speech of the Hon. OSCAR W. CALLAWAY, of Texas, which had escaped my notice. On finding this out yesterday I wrote Mr. CALLAWAY, notifying him that I should bring the matter up immediately after the reading of the Journal this morning. Mr. CALLAWAY made a speech May 29 in this House which I heard—or, at least, I thought I heard the whole of it—but it seems that in the speech in this Congressional News and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I find a reflection upon me and my character as a Representative, which I am informed by the official reporters of debates was inserted as an extension of his remarks.

Now, I do not care whether it was inserted as an extension of remarks or not; that is a mere trivial detail. The question is whether he has any justification for what he said.

The SPEAKER. What is the matter the gentleman complains of?

Mr. GARDNER. I am about coming to that.

THE FEAR THAT DISTURBS NEW YORK'S PEACE OF MIND.

The Maxims, Gardners, and Thompsons have attempted to frighten the people into the belief that we were in danger of invasion. That is not the fear that disturbs the peace of mind of the gentlemen on the Naval Affairs Committee who heard the evidence. The fear that disturbs the peace of mind of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts is not that our homes will be invaded, our cities bombarded, or our coasts laid waste; it is that the stocks of the Bethlehem, Midvale, Carnegie, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and New Jersey steel, ordnance, and ship manufacturing concerns will shrink when the foreign war closes unless a new market is developed. Bethlehem Steel stock increased, due to war, from $30 a share to $530 a share. Certain powder stocks increased from $8 a share to $1,100 a share.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this sort of a thing has been going on from time to time in the press, and I have noticed implications in extension of remarks before in the House. All I want is to have that investigated by somebody. If it is true, I do not care—although obviously it is out of order to insert matter of that sort in the RECORD—but if the gentleman from Texas had any justification for his remarks, I have no objection to their standing in the RECORD. If he had no justification for his remarks, then, Mr. Speaker, it is time that this House should begin to take action on that sort of thing, because we complain every day because throughout the country accusations which we can not meet are made about us. Now, if we allow Members to accuse each other and take no action on it, you can not blame the general public for what they say.

Mr. Speaker, I expected the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to be here at this time, and if he had been here he would have presented a resolution to refer the speech of the gentleman from Texas to a special committee of five, to be appointed by the Speaker, the committee being instructed not to investigate the parliamentary situation but to investigate the whole thing—investigate me, investigate the speech, and make such recommendations to the House as that committee thought fit.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I did not happen to be in the Chamber when the gentleman began his remarks. Were these remarks delivered by Mr. CALLAWAY on the floor of the House?

Mr. GARDNER. The reporters of debates tell me not.

Mr. GARNER. If they were delivered on the floor of the House, does the gentleman from Massachusetts think, at this time when Mr. CALLAWAY is away in Texas in his campaign, that he ought to call this up?

Mr. GARDNER. I wrote to Mr. CALLAWAY yesterday, not knowing that he was away, but the gentleman from Texas must realize that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] did not select the time when I was present. I think the gentleman will see that I am not making any reflection on the gentleman from Texas. I am saying that it ought to be investigated, and no matter whether he said it on the floor or not, if I was there it was a reflection on me, and if I was not there it was still a reflection on me. Of course, he can make a very good defense by showing he was justified in saying that thing. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the Speaker appoint a committee of five to look into this whole question, to take such steps as are necessary to make a thorough examination of the situation and to report to the House what they think ought to be done in the premises.

Mr. GARNER. For what purpose would the committee be appointed?

Mr. GARDNER. To ascertain whether the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CALLAWAY] had any basis in fact for his reflection; and if so, to say that he had, and if not, to say that he had not. Of course, I should expect that the committee would probably recommend, in those circumstances, striking the remarks out of the RECORD, unless the gentleman could show some substantial basis in fact for them.

Mr. GARNER. I do not know; I can not speak for Mr. CALLAWAY's views in the premises, but I do want to make this statement, that Mr. CALLAWAY is in Texas in the midst of a campaign——

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ASWELL. Is the case presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts one of personal privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. It reflects upon his integrity as a Member of this House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, what I was about to say, when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL] interrupted, was that we are all more or less familiar with the fact that at times some of us have to make campaigns. As is well known, in Texas the principal campaign that we have is in the primaries. The primary election in Texas occurs on July 22.

I do not anticipate that Mr. CALLAWAY could conveniently—at least within a degree of safety, probably, to his own interest in that campaign—return here before that time, and in the very nature of things it would be probably or possibly unjust to him to launch into an investigation at this time of a statement that he made either upon the floor of the House or which he placed in his remarks in extension and not give him an opportunity to be heard in the premises.

Mr. GARDNER. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. I was sure the gentleman would. I have no objection to the appointment of a committee, if that committee can make it convenient to pursue this investigation when Mr. CALLAWAY can be present and can be heard in his own behalf.

Mr. GARDNER. I would think it perfectly safe to leave that with the committee. I think the committee could easily take the deposition of Mr. CALLAWAY.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to make this statement in order that it might be in the RECORD, so that the committee could see the position of Mr. CALLAWAY.

Mr. GARDNER. Of course it does not help me at all if Mr. CALLAWAY does not have a chance to fully state his case.

Mr. KITCHIN. Could not the gentleman delay this matter until, say, the middle of next week?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. KITCHIN. And we will see if we can not get Mr. CALLAWAY here.

Mr. GARDNER. I am willing to do that if I do not abandon my right to bring the matter before the House. I ask unanimous consent that I may bring the question before the House as a matter of personal privilege at any time within——

Mr. KITCHIN. Say, within 10 days.

Mr. GARDNER. Any time within 10 days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may finish his statement as to this question of personal privilege at any time that suits his convenience within 10 days.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to reserve the right to offer a privileged resolution, of course.

The SPEAKER. Of course that goes with the other.

Mr. GARDNER. And retain all of the rights that I have now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Absolutely the same rights the gentleman has now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to bill of the following title:

H. R. 8654. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909, by adding a new section to be known as section 7.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4268) to satisfy certain claims against the Government arising under the Navy Department, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. BRYAN, Mr. LANE, and Mr. GRONNA as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14484) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to bill (H. R. 13486) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, agreed to the conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. JOHNSON of Maine, Mr. HUGHES, and Mr. POINDEXTER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13383. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 36) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Duchesne, Utah, had requested a conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to bill of the following title, had requested a conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. MYERS, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 35. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for certain lands to the town of Myton, Utah.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) withholding from allotment the unallotted lands or public domain of the Creek Nation or Tribe of Indians and providing for the sale thereof, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 13233) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to exchange lands belonging to the United States at the mouth of Crum River, Pa., for other lands adjacent thereto, for the purpose of removing thereto the Schooner Ledge Range Front Light, so that it may be on the range of the channel of the Delaware River, and further authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to remove said range light from its present location to the property acquired by the exchange.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On June 19, 1916:

H. R. 13064. An act for the relief of M. A. Sweeney Shipyards & Foundry Co.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAY. Mr Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16460) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. Pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that there shall be general debate of 1 hour and 20 minutes, one half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, and pending the motion, asks unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill be limited to 1 hour and 20 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if he can not make that 45 minutes on a side? That would meet with the requests for time that I have.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the general debate upon the bill will be limited to 45 minutes on a side, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia, and one-half by the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to resolve the House into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16460, the Army appropriation bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS in the chair.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries an appropriation of a little over $157,000,000. The Committee on Military Affairs in reporting the bill believe that they have provided for an ample sum for all of the needs of the Army as they may occur during the next fiscal year provided that no unusual emergency should take place. There is one item in the bill of $500,000 for civilian camps, and when that item is reached I propose to move to increase that item up to $2,000,000. The committee at the time it was considering the bill did not have before it any information as to how many persons would attend these camps, and therefore were unable to make an accurate estimate as to how much would be needed. Since that time the War Department has furnished the committee with information which would tend to show that there might be about 30,000 or more who would attend these camps. It costs $43 per man, according to the estimate of the War Department, to subsist, transport, and to take care of these men at these camps.

I will also offer at the proper time an amendment providing that all persons who now attend the camps or who have attended them before the 1st of July shall have their expenses paid, as I think it is nothing but right that they should all be placed upon the same footing. I shall also ask that whatever money is expended shall be expended on men between the ages of 18 and 45 years, for the reason that men over the age of 45 years can not be called into the service of the United States; therefore I do not think the Government ought to spend any money on training persons whose services they can not get if they should need them.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman feel the age of 45 is rather a long age to spend money on training?

Mr. HAY. That is the age fixed by law for the service of men in the Army.

Mr. COX. If we should become involved in war, there is not much likelihood of men of 45 years of age being called out.

Mr. HAY. They could be called out. I do not know whether they would be or not. That depends a good deal on how many were called.

Mr. COX. Now, these men in the training camps, as I understand the matter, do not get any salary at all.

Mr. HAY. No; they get no pay.

Mr. COX. Simply their expenses?

Mr. HAY. They get transportation, subsistence, their uniforms, shelter, and all that.

Mr. COX. And how long are they supposed to stay in the camps?

Mr. HAY. These camps, I think, continue each for a month.

Mr. COX. Thirty days?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought it was understood the expenses of these people were to be paid by the corporations which are so anxious about the matter. My understanding was the United States Steel Corporation and some others have agreed to pay the expenses of their men.

Mr. HAY. Well, if they want to pay them of course they can do so.

Mr. BAILEY. They certainly will not pay them if we provide their expenses.

Mr. HAY. I do not know anything about that; I have no information on that. The only information I have comes from the War Department, and they inform me that these men will be in these training camps and they will need this much to support them.

Mr. BAILEY. In what manner are these men recruited for these training camps, voluntarily?

Mr. HAY. Voluntarily, oh yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts if he desires to ask some questions.

Mr. GARDNER. I should like to ask the gentleman several questions.

Mr. HAY. Very well.

Mr. GARDNER. Gen. Crozier asked for $1,670,000 for automatic rifles for the Organized Militia and $1,400,000 for the Regular Army, did he not?

Mr. HAY. He may have; yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman appropriate in this bill any money for automatic rifles for the Organized Militia?

Mr. HAY. We have not.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman tell the committee why not?

Mr. HAY. I do not know whether I am at liberty to state it. Gen. Crozier made some confidential statements about automatic rifles which led the committee to believe that the $1,400,000—and, by the way, I will say to the gentleman this is a reserve—we now have automatic rifles enough to arm——

Mr. GARDNER. That is on the basis of five machine guns to each regiment?

Mr. HAY. Yes. The gun which was recommended costs $3,000, and he intimated to us they were trying out a gun costing only $1,200, and they had not come to any conclusion as to which one they would buy. Under those circumstances the committee thought that it was not necessary to appropriate such a large sum for these machine guns until we knew just what the department was going to do. As a matter of fact, the Ordnance Department for the last three years has not spent any money on these guns because they were unable to determine what type of guns they were going to buy.

Mr. GARDNER. We heard that about aeroplanes, about battleships, submarines, and engines many times.

Mr. HAY. Does the gentleman want to appropriate for guns that have not been selected?

Mr. GARDNER. Why, surely. Since you ask for the $1,400,000 for the Regular Army, why should you not do for the National Guard just as well?

Mr. HAY. Because there is no necessity for it.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, let me ask the gentleman another question. That estimate is based on five machine guns to a regiment, is it not?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. And does not the War Department say that there ought to be 12 to each regiment?

Mr. HAY. It has not told me so.

Mr. GARDNER. I shall endeavor to bring that fact out.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman seems to be in the confidence of the War Department. If he has any information of that sort authoritatively from the Secretary of War, I would be glad if he would give it.

Mr. GARDNER. In a few minutes I shall read Gen. Crozier's letter to that effect. Let me ask the gentleman this question: He appropriates $3,000,000 for artillery ammunition as a part of the reserve to be accumulated against the outbreak of war for the Organized Militia; that is for the National Guard. How many rounds of 3-inch shrapnel will that amount to?

Mr. HAY. I can not tell the gentleman exactly, but I will say that the fortifications bill carries an appropriation of $6,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition. This bill carries $3,000,000, which makes $9,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition, all for the reserve.

Mr. GARDNER. Is it not true that the $6,000,000 in the fortifications bill was for the Regular Army, while you are appropriating for the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. Not at all. They are appropriated under those heads, and all reserves are to be used in time of war by the Regular Army, by the National Guard, or by the Volunteers, if they need them.

Mr. GARDNER. Your appropriation is still under the old Greble Board plan, is it not, that was adopted in 1907?

Mr. HAY. No; the appropriation in this bill has been placed in it with a view to the appropriation made by the fortifications committee, believing that the two appropriations together would provide a reserve sufficient for the purpose of accumulating this field-artillery ammunition.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not this a correct statement of the fact? After the fortifications committee appropriated the full amount asked by Gen. Crozier for field-artillery ammunition, Gen. Crozier came to you and asked you for $8,000,000 more? He asked you for that amount, did he not?

Mr. HAY. He did, in person, but the estimates that were made to us did not carry any estimate at all for field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard.

Mr. GARDNER. But does not the gentleman know that the reason the estimate did not carry it was because at the time the estimates were made it was Secretary Garrison's plan to have a continental army, and therefore there were no estimates to be made for Field Artillery and field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard.

Mr. HAY. I do not know any reason why there should have been no estimate made for field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard, which is really for the whole country and for all branches of the service.

I know there was no reason why the estimates should not have been made for field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard just because it was thought there would be a continental army.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman will excuse me, I think there was a very good reason for it, and that was because the reserve was supposed to be used by the continental army in time of war, and therefore the reserve ammunition was to be provided for it. Now the gentleman appropriates $3,000,000——

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman wants to make a speech, he can make it in his own time. I am willing to answer questions——

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman does not wish to answer questions——

Mr. HAY. I will answer them, but the gentleman will please ask them, and not make a speech.

Mr. GARDNER. Very well. How much have the gentleman's committee appropriated for field artillery for the National Guard, for the cannon?

Mr. HAY. Three million dollars.

Mr. GARDNER. How much did Gen. Crozier ask for?

Mr. HAY. He asked for a very large sum; but the fortifications committee appropriated $6,000,000 for that purpose, and the Committee on Military Affairs thought that $3,000,000 added to that would be sufficient.

Mr. GARDNER. How much did Gen. Crozier ask for, in addition to what had already been granted by Mr. SHERLEY'S committee on fortifications?

Mr. HAY. I do not recall just how much he did ask for, and I do not know that the Committee on Military Affairs or the Congress is bound to appropriate every dollar that any bureau chief asks for.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman know how many batteries can be procured—3-inch guns—with that $3,000,000?

Mr. HAY. Yes. Three-inch guns cost about $85,000 a battery, four guns to a battery. The gentleman can make the calculation.

Mr. GARDNER. How many? Will not the gentleman help us?

Mr. HAY. Divide $3,000,000 by $85,000, which is the cost of a battery of four guns. The gentleman can do that.

Mr. GARDNER. It is about 34 batteries, is it not?

Mr. HAY. Thirty-four batteries; yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. The total estimate as given in the report is something over $200,000,000, and the amount carried in the bill is $157,000,000. Can the gentleman tell us in a general way what amounts were curtailed in order to make that reduction, or what particular items were cut down?

Mr. HAY. One item asked for was $24,000,000 for field artillery guns, and we gave $3,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Was that the largest reduction that was made?

Mr. HAY. That was the largest reduction; yes.

Mr. TOWNER. What were the estimates for the Army, for the pay of the men, if the gentleman remembers?

Mr. HAY. There were so many estimates made—I think the pay of the enlisted men of the Army was put at about $24,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Was that reduced in any way?

Mr. HAY. It was reduced, I think, about $1,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Can the gentleman give us the number of men in the line that were appropriated for?

Mr. HAY. One hundred and five thousand.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not expected that that number will be largely increased?

Mr. HAY. I think not. That was what the War Department asked for.

Mr. TOWNER. You gave them all that the War Department asked for on that particular item?

Mr. HAY. On that item, yes; all that we thought would be spent on it.

Mr. TOWNER. Can the gentleman now, or will he in the extension of his remarks or otherwise, give us the particular items that were reduced from the estimates asked for by the department?

Mr. HAY. I could do that. I can not do it on my feet.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman tell us how much more this bill carries than the bill carried four years ago?

Mr. HAY. The bill one year ago carried $100,000,000. This bill carries $56,000,000 more than the bill of a year ago.

Mr. SABATH. And how much more than four years ago? Has the gentleman that in mind?

Mr. HAY. I do not recall it, but I suppose about $63,000,000 or $64,000,000 more than the bill of four years ago.

Mr. COX. The appropriation four years ago was $97,000,000, I think.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman tell me how many enlisted men of the line could be lawfully appropriated for for the next fiscal year?

Mr. HAY. I do not know that I can tell the gentleman exactly, but these men are to be added in increments of one-fifth annually. Thirty-four regiments of infantry have been added by the act of June 3. One-fifth of that would be about seven regiments of infantry. Does the gentleman mean at full strength or at peace strength?

Mr. GARDNER. I mean the legal peace strength that could be recruited under the new Hay-Chamberlain Act before the emergency arises. The gentleman will understand that I refer to the fact that the new law limits the number of enlisted men of the line to 175,000 men, coupled with the fact that we are obliged by law to increase in five annual jumps of so many men each time.

Mr. HAY. Seven regiments of Infantry at peace strength would be 1,200 men to a regiment, which would make 8,400 men in the Infantry. Ten regiments of Cavalry—one-fifth—would be two regiments; that would be 1,200 under the new bill, I think.

Mr. GARDNER. Would 115,000 be an outside figure?

Mr. HAY. I think it would be more than that.

Mr. GARDNER. One hundred and twenty thousand.

Mr. HAY. I think 120,000 would be about the right number. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is not expected, nor can it be hoped for, that the additional men can be raised on the 1st of July. Therefore, in appropriating for a fiscal year the committee has always given some leeway, so that we would not be appropriating more money than could be used. It is hardly possible that all these additional commands will be raised before the 1st day of January, if then; and therefore we did not appropriate the full amount.

Mr. GARDNER. You can not lawfully raise more than 120,000 men before July 17, unless war is imminent; is that correct?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I assume that is correct, as both gentlemen say it is; but let me ask the gentleman from Virginia, did we not pass a resolution authorizing these regiments to be filled to the full strength?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not that still in effect?

Mr. HAY. Yes. But I call the gentleman's attention to the fact——

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the possibility.

Mr. HAY. I am getting at that. They have only been able to raise 10,000 men under that resolution. Now, we could get about 10,000 more, but as they get these recruits the terms of other men expire, and, as a matter of fact, they are not keeping the regiments up to full war strength, as was contemplated by the resolution, for that reason.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say and the gentleman from Virginia to confirm the statement that we could not increase the Army now to over 120,000 men. I understood by the joint resolution that we practically then authorized an increase of about 120,000 and had made other increases.

Mr. HAY. There is some difference of opinion in regard to that. What we did was to authorize the President to fill up all the different organizations to war strength. I was contending that that would make an army of 119,000 men, but the gentleman from Massachusetts says that it would only make about 106,000.

Mr. GARDNER. One hundred thousand two hundred and ninety-seven of the line and 5,713 of the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. MANN. Now, if we do raise the present commands up to full war strength it would make, as he says, 106,000 men. Is that what the gentleman from Virginia says?

Mr. HAY. I think not. I think 119,000. There is a difference of opinion in the War Department. Additions are being made to other regiments which we provided for, and it will run it up to about 130,000 men.

Mr. MANN. I thought that was the assertion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have a problem in connection with the National Guard which I would like some information upon. It is in connection with providing transportation for members of the National Guard who are away from their States. I have received a telegram which came to a young man, a member of the National Guard of Washington, who is here in this city. It is as follows:

ALFRED C. PALMER,
Washington, D. C.:
Report for duty at American Lake Camp, Tacoma, Wash., immediately.
Capt. H. W. PALMER.

The young man is here and he has not the railroad fare. I called up the Judge Advocate General, and he said, "Let him get on a railroad freight train and go." Well, the distance is 3,200 miles, the weather is a little warm, and he can not do it. Is there any way if the State supplies the money in which it would be reimbursed?

Mr. HAY. I do not know of any.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The State would have to get its young men back at its own expense.

Mr. HAY. I think so.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Since it is a matter of information, may I make an inquiry of the gentleman? Is there any statute authorizing the War Department or the President to organize independent regiments in time of peace?

Mr. HAY. I do not know of any.

Mr. GARNER. In case of war, would Congress have to pass additional legislation in order for the President to organize independent regiments outside of the State militia?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That was my understanding of it, but I wanted the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. HAY. My understanding is that for the raising of any troops outside of the Regular Army it must be authorized by Congress to confer on the President the power to call for volunteers, and also the power to draft the National Guard.

Mr. GARNER. In calling for volunteers it has been the custom to call on the different States through the governors to secure the volunteers?

Mr. HAY. It has been the custom to do that and to divide the number of men called for among the States according to population.

Mr. HICKS. Is there any provision of law by which any employee of the Government in the National Guard may have his position left open when he returns?

Mr. HAY. I do not know of any and I do not think there is.

Mr. HICKS. Then they are liable to lose their positions if they go to the front?

Mr. HAY. They are. When a man goes into the military service he takes that chance of course.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. There appears to be a difference of opinion with reference to what was done by the resolution of Congress. Does the gentleman know what the War Department has determined with reference to the resolution and what construction the War Department has placed upon the resolution as to the number of men in the line?

Mr. HAY. As I understand it, the War Department has determined that under that resolution they have a right to fill up the present organizations to full war strength.

Mr. DOWELL. Does that increase the 20,000 beyond the amount authorized prior to the passage of the resolution?

Mr. HAY. In my judgment it increases the Army by nineteen thousand and some hundred men.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that the construction that the War Department places upon it?

Mr. HAY. It was at one time. I do not know what it is now.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I hold in my hand a letter from The Adjutant General, in response to my request for a statement on that very matter. I will place it in the RECORD. The summary of it is that the strength of the line as now authorized by Executive order is 100,297, and the strength of the Philippine Scouts is 5,733.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The gentleman says "by Executive order." Of course, the President can make any Executive order within the resolution and within the law that he pleases. That is a very different proposition from filling up the organization to the full strength. The President by Executive order can have the Army down as low as 57,000 men, if he wants to do it, or he can have 100,000, but I contend that when you fill up all of the organizations to war strength the Army will then be 119,000 men, and that was what was intended by the resolution which was passed here and about which we are talking.

Mr. GARDNER. I will read the gentleman the figures to show him that he is mistaken. I am not speaking of the Executive order, but for the sake of argument I am assuming that the interpretation to be put upon that resolution is that every organization should be filled up.

Mr. HAY. Not at all. The resolution only permitted it, and the President can do it or not as he sees fit.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not this the fact: The War Department said there is no use in filling up the mobile troops over in the Philippines and in Hawaii, because they can not get down into Mexico anyway?

Mr. HAY. Why, no; they did not do it because they have full strength in both places.

Mr. GARDNER. In the Coast Artillery, I believe.

Mr. HAY. But the gentleman was talking about the mobile troops.

Mr. GARDNER. I was.

Mr. HAY. They have full strength regiments in both the Philippines and Hawaii of mobile troops.

Mr. GARDNER. May I read the letter.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I will first insert my letter, which is as follows:

MAY 25, 1916.

Brig. Gen. H. P. MCCAIN, United States Army,
The Adjutant General, War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Will you be good enough to tell me what the authorized strength of the enlisted line of the Army is under the law as it stands at present. The figure which I am anxious to ascertain correctly is the authorized strength as it stood after the passage of the recent joint resolution permitting the recruitment of the organizations of the Army up to the maximum strength.

I think I understood you to say the other day that the total strength of the enlisted line as now authorized, if fully recruited, would consist of 103,294 United States Army soldiers and 5,733 Philippine Scouts.

To what extent are those figures modified by the executive order under which the Secretary of War has ordered the recruiting to be carried on?

Very truly, yours, A. P. GARDNER.

In response to that letter came the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, May 29, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives,

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your request of the 25th instant that you be furnished with a statement showing the strength of the line of the Army as authorized by the joint resolution of March 17, 1916, and the strength as now authorized by executive order, I beg leave to advise you as follows:

The strength of the line of the Army—Engineers, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery, Cavalry, and Infantry—as authorized by the resolution referred to is 103,294, and the strength of the Philippine Scouts is 12,000.

I do not suppose that the joint resolution meant us to recruit Philippine Scouts, but even if we did——

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is not reading the letter, he is making a speech.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman is perfectly right. I continue from the letter:

The strength of the Signal Corps, Ordnance Department, service-school detachment, unassigned recruits, recruiting parties, etc., is not included in the foregoing figures, although those organizations form a part of the Army.

But not the enlisted line.

Mr. HAY. How large are they? How large are those the gentleman just read?

Mr. GARDNER. I do not know; but at present probably a good deal less than 20,000. The question which interests us is the enlisted line of the Army, the fighting men, not the teamsters and the baggage-masters nor the hospital stewards. The letter then concludes as follows:

The strength of the line as now authorized by Executive order is 100,297, and the strength of the Philippine Scouts is 5,733.

The difference between the strength as authorized by the resolution and as authorized by Executive order is that the strength of the organizations serving outside the continental limits of the United States were not increased by Executive order.

Very truly, yours,
H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

I think that is what I said.

Mr. HAY. Yes; because they are already filled.

Mr. GARDNER. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Philippine Scouts are now increased to the maximum strength?

Mr. HAY. No; I said the organizations serving in the Philippines and in the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not the Philippine Scouts force the principal part of the mobile army in the Philippines?

Mr. HAY. It is not. There are about 13,000 men in the Philippines.

Mr. GARDNER. How many of those in the coast defenses?

Mr. HAY. I could not say how many.

Mr. GARDNER. I think the gentleman will find that the Philippine Scouts constitute perhaps not a majority, but a very considerable part of the mobile force of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. HAY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. However, is the gentleman through now? If he is, I will go on with what I had to say. Mr. Chairman, when the Army reorganization bill was before the House a great deal of criticism was had because it was stated that the Congress was not following the expert opinion of the Army officers, but that we were making an reorganization bill without regard to the advice and experience of these experts. I hold in my hand the Army and Navy Register, a service paper, and in that paper there is a memorandum furnished by the General Staff to the Secretary of War analyzing the Army reorganization bill. Among other things, the following is said:

In general terms it may be said that this is the first comprehensive legislation for national defense. It provides as far as can be seen for the needs and men and material, and it has been pronounced by all who are competent to judge as the best military legislation that the country has ever had.

That is the opinion of the General Staff. Here is an opinion of Maj. Connor, of the General Staff, in a memorandum made for the Secretary of War. He says:

The consensus of opinion in regard to this bill undoubtedly is that it is far and away the best bill that has ever been written for our Army on the subject of military organization. There undoubtedly are certain things which might be left out and other things which might be added, but nevertheless the statement can not be controverted that it is the first and only comprehensive measure looking to military preparedness that has ever been passed by Congress.

That is the opinion of the expert in the War Department about this bill.

Mr. GARDNER. Did the gentleman say Maj. Connor?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. There are people who are more expert, he will admit?

Mr. HAY. Oh, of course, the gentleman undoubtedly is more expert.

Mr. GARDNER. I was not personal to the gentleman from Virginia. I have refrained from personality.

Mr. HAY. I am not personal at all.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman was personal.

Mr. HAY. I was just giving the gentleman his merited meed of praise.

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman was personal.

Mr. HAY. The first opinion I read here was the opinion of the General Staff generally, not that of any individual.

Mr. GARDNER. By what authority does the gentleman say that; on the authority of the Army and Navy Register?

Mr. HAY. No, sir; I ask leave to print these two articles as part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend as a part of his remarks certain articles indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The articles are as follows:

ANALYSIS OF THE ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The Secretary of War on May 26 forwarded to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs memorandums of analysis of the Army reorganization bill and comparison with provisions of the bill drafted by the General Staff for reorganizing the Army.

Mr. Baker said:

"I have had the provisions of House bill No. 12766 carefully analyzed and compared with the provisions of the bill drafted by the General Staff for reorganizing the Army. The comparison and analysis were made by a member of the General Staff, and the memorandums embodying the results of that comparison and analysis are inclosed for your information.

"I fully indorse the statement made in one of the memorandums that the bill recently agreed to is the most comprehensive measure looking to military preparedness that has ever been passed by Congress. Assuring you that the bill is very satisfactory to me and that the untiring efforts of the Senate and House to afford the people of this country adequate military protection are deeply appreciated."

ANALYSIS OF THE NEW ARMY BILL.

The new Army bill provides for four classes of soldiers in the United States: First, the Regular Army; second, the National Guard; third, the enlisted Reserve Corps, all of which shall exist in time of peace; and, fourth, the Volunteer Army, which will be raised only in time of war. The peace strength of the Regular Army is approximately 11,000 officers, not to exceed 175,000 combatant troops, and approximately 40,000 noncombatant troops, including the unassigned recruits. The National Guard will consist of about 17,000 officers and 440,000 men. The number of men who will join the enlisted Reserve Corps can not be foretold. They are practically enlisted specialists for the technical departments of the Army, recruited in time of peace for use in time of war only, and are subject in time of peace to short periods of training yearly. Volunteers can be called in time of war when and in such numbers as Congress shall authorize.

The Regular Army will be made up of the organizations shown in the following table, wherein is also shown the existing organizations and the existing numbers authorized by law:

Old laws.

Organizations.	Officers.	Enlisted men.[1]
31 regiments Infantry	1,531	25,035 56,315
15 regiments Cavalry	750	12,240 18,540
6 regiments Field Artillery	246	5,010 7,116
3 battalions Engineers	57	1,234 2,002
Coast Artillery Corps (170 companies)	701	19,321
Total combatants	3,285	62,840 103,294
Signal Corps	106	1,472
Medical Department	504	4,012
Quartermaster Corps	187	6,403
Other troops and staff departments	765	1,472
Philippine Scouts	182	5,733 12,000
Total	5,029	81,932 128,653

New laws.

Organizations.	Officers.	Enlisted men.[1]
65 regiments Infantry	3,314	85,865 126,230
25 regiments Cavalry	1,300	24,350 36,250
21 regiments Field Artillery	876	17,752 26,361
7 regiments Engineers	231	4,697 7,077

[1] Upper figures equal minimum strength; lower figures equal maximum strength.

New laws—Continued.

Organization.	Officers.	Enlisted Men.
2 battalions Mounted Engineers	32	458 692
Band Engineers		30
Coast Artillery Corps (263 companies)	1,201	30,000
Total combatants	6,954	163,161 226,649
Signal Corps	275	[1] 3,387 4,338
Medical Department	1,750 2,365	[1] 10,500 14,100
Quartermaster Corps	[2] 369	[1] 6,403
Other troops and staff departments	1,797	19,154 24,356
Philippine Scouts	182	5,733 12,000
Total	11,327 11,942	208,338 287,846

[1] These figures are approximate, to be fixed by the President in accordance with the needs of the Army; the enlisted men of the medical department to be 5 per cent of the authorized strength of the Army. The above figures of "Enlisted men" do not include the "wagoners," number not yet determined.
[2] Includes 73 pay clerks with the rank of second lieutenant.

The Army will be increased 34½ regiments of Infantry, 10 regiments of Cavalry, 15 regiments of Field Artillery, 93 companies of Coast Artillery, 5 regiments of Engineers, 2 battalions of Mounted Engineers, the necessary number of auxiliary troops in the Medical Department, Quartermaster Corps, Signal Corps, and the unassigned recruits, and in addition thereto the number of Philippine Scouts that may be determined upon by the President, not to exceed a maximum of 12,000.

The organizations provided for will be divided into two classes—oversea garrisons and the Army in the United States. Just what the composition of each of the garrisons in the Philippine Islands, Hawaiian Islands, and Panama will be can not be foretold at the present time, but the aggregate will probably be about three Infantry divisions. There will probably be a regiment of Infantry in Alaska and one in Porto Rico. This will leave for the United States 4 Infantry divisions and 2 Cavalry divisions. Each Infantry division will consist of 3 Infantry brigades (9 regiments), 1 regiment of Cavalry, 1 brigade of Field Artillery (3 regiments), 1 regiment of Engineers, 1 field signal battalion, 1 aero squadron, and the ammunition, supply, engineer, and sanitary trains. Each Cavalry division will consist of 3 Cavalry brigades (9 regiments), 1 regiment of Horse Artillery, 1 battalion of Mounted Engineers, 1 field signal battalion, 1 aero squadron, and ammunition, supply, engineer, and sanitary trains. After deducting the necessary troops for the over-sea garrisons, the troops remaining in the United States are just sufficient to organize the divisions mentioned, and this gives what is termed a well-balanced military organization, because there is just enough of each arm to make a good fighting machine, and there are no extra organizations left over. This is the first time in our history that the Army has been organized on such a basis, although nearly all other armies of the world are so organized.

The number of general officers of the Army has been increased from 7 major generals and 17 brigadier generals to 11 major generals and 36 brigadier generals. This will provide the necessary general officers to command the divisions and brigades and furnish the general officers for the General Staff.

The General Staff Corps has been increased from 38 officers to 57 officers, and the duties of the General Staff remain the same as they were before the writing of the new bill. This important corps has been nearly doubled, and with its increased numbers the General Staff will be better able than heretofore to perform its important functions.

The Adjutant General's Department, the Inspector General's Department, the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Medical Department have all been materially increased to meet the increased size of the Regular Army. There is nothing materially new in regard to these departments or corps.

The number of officers in the Corps of Engineers will also be increased, and the Engineer troops for Infantry divisions will hereafter be organized into regiments instead of battalions, as heretofore, while the mounted Engineer troops for use with the Cavalry divisions will be battalion organizations.

The Ordnance Department and the Signal Corps both required very material increases, inasmuch as the work of the Ordnance Department in the design and construction of new armament will be far more than proportional to the increase in the Army, and the greatly increased importance of aviation work required a correspondingly larger increase in that section of the Signal Corps.

The Medical Department was increased by the addition thereto of a new Corps of Veterinarians, which corps, together with the Dental Corps, have been given increased rank, with the accompanying pay and allowances. These two corps should hereafter increase greatly in their efficiency.

The organization of Infantry and Cavalry regiments will be changed by the introduction of three new companies—i. e., the headquarters, supply, and machine-gun companies. These companies have existed as provisional organizations for some time, but the personnel therefor had to be taken from the other companies of the regiment, thereby depleting the ordinary companies and at the same time not making the provisional companies as efficient as they should be. The new law prescribes an independent personnel for these three new companies and at the same time increases the Infantry companies from 65 men to 100 men and leaves the troop of Cavalry approximately as it is now. Each regiment of Field Artillery has been increased by a headquarters and a supply company for the same reasons that these organizations were added to the Infantry and Cavalry regiments.

The organization of the regimental units of these three arms was worked out with great care and represents the very latest improvements known to military experts. The following table shows the organization of the various regiments at peace and war strength under the old law and the new law:

Organizations.	Old law.		New law.

The Coast Artillery has been increased from 701 officers and 19,321 men to 1,201 officers and 30,009 enlisted men, giving that corps the full complement that it requires in regular officers and men for the harbor defense of the country. The remaining number of officers and men will be supplied from the National Guard.

The Porto Rico Regiment has been increased from two battalions to three battalions, and will be organized as other regiments of Infantry of the Army.

Hereafter all officers appointed as second lieutenants in the Army will be given provisional appointments for a period of two years, during which period of probation they must either demonstrate their ability and fitness or make room for a new candidate. All new officers will be drawn from graduates of the United States Military Academy, from enlisted men of the Regular Army, from members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, or the National Guard, or from honor graduates of military schools, or, lastly, from civil life.

The increase in the Regular Army will be made in five annual increments, beginning July 1, 1916, and running to July 1, 1920, although the President is authorized to make the increase more rapidly in case of emergency.

The condition of retired officers is improved, in that the time which such a retired officer may serve on active duty brings to him increased pay and rank corresponding to his period of active service, and in time of war retired officers may be used as the President shall prescribe.

In order to provide for the regular officers necessary for duty with the National Guard, duty at the various colleges where military instruction is given, for recruit duty, military attachés, etc., provision is made for a detached officers' list which provides 1,022 officers in addition to those necessary with organizations. This supplies the officers necessary for these various duties prescribed by law without taking them away from their organizations.

Up to the present time promotion has been more or less unequal at different times in the different branches of the service, and to a certain extent this detached officers' list will be utilized to equalize promotion in the different branches, and for the same purpose authorization is given to transfer officers from one branch of the line to another to fill the vacancies created by the new act.

Officers of the Philippine Scouts are not officers of the Regular Army, and heretofore no provision has been made for their retirement, but the new bill provides that hereafter they shall have the right to retirement and retired pay.

The present enlistment contract provides for a seven-year enlistment, four of which shall be with the colors and three with the reserve. Under the new law these periods are reversed—that is, three years with the colors and four in the reserve—but an important addition is made, namely, that at the end of one year's service any enlisted man within the continental limits of the United States may be discharged if he has become proficient in that time. This is an important proviso, and will, it is believed, increase the number of enlistments. In addition to that, provision is made for paying the enlisted men in the reserve $24 a year, and the President is authorized to utilize the personnel of any department of the Government, such as postmasters, mail carriers, etc., to keep track of reservists and also to use the postmasters (except first class) to obtain recruits for the Army.

No material change is made in the Regular Army Reserve nor in the inducements offered to ex-soldiers to return to the colors in time of war.

Enlisted men are prohibited from engaging in any civil occupations, whether for pay or otherwise, that would put them in competition with men in civil life.

An officers' reserve corps is provided, which will authorize the commissioning of civilians up to and including the grade of major in the various branches of the Army. These men can be selected and trained in time of peace, and the officers so obtained will be far better prepared than any volunteers that could be raised hurriedly at the outbreak of war. In order to obtain these reserve officers a reserve officers' training corps is authorized, which will consist of units at the various colleges, academies, and universities throughout the country, where military education and training will be given, which, in connection with six weeks' field training each summer, will give a personnel for the officers' reserve corps that is far better equipped for the duties of an officer than any heretofore available.

In order to provide the enlisted men for the various technical staff corps and departments an enlisted reserve corps has been authorized, which will consist of men whose daily occupation in civil life specially fits them for duty in the Engineer, Signal, and Quartermaster Corps and in the Ordnance and Medical Departments. This enlisted reserve corps will provide the railway operatives, bridge builders, chauffeurs, hospital attendants, nurses, telegraphers, etc., required for the departments and corps mentioned. It is impracticable to keep in the Regular Army the number of men of these classes that will be necessary in time of war, and the enlisted reserve corps will provide for the deficiency.

No provision is made for a volunteer force in time of peace, but in place thereof the ideas embodied in the business men's camps of 1915 have been provided for, and the new law provides that all expenses in connection with attendance at such camps shall be borne by the Federal Government Heretofore individuals attending the camps paid for their own transportation, uniform, food, clothing, etc., the total expense of which probably averaged about $65 per member. This limited the personnel attending said camps to the more or less affluent; but under the new law any citizen who desires to take such training can obtain it without personal pecuniary sacrifice.

The National Guard is, within the limits of the Constitution, federalized. The maximum number authorized is 800 for each Representative and Senator in Congress and such number from the Territories as the President shall prescribe. This will probably give a total of about 17,000 officers and 440,000 enlisted men. The organization of the National Guard will conform to that of the Regular Army, as will also its equipment and armament.

The President is authorized to organize the National Guard into brigades, divisions, and other tactical units and to prescribe the kind of organizations that shall be maintained in the various States to insure that these brigades and divisions will be complete in all respects. Certain qualifications are required of officers of the National Guard, and although these officers will still be commissioned by the governors they will not be recognized by the Federal Government unless they fulfill the prescribed qualifications. Regular Army officers may be commissioned in the National Guard if the governors so desire. Enlistments in the National Guard will be for six years, three years with the colors and three years with the reserves, but a man may serve out his enlistment, if he so desires, instead of going into the reserve. Hereafter the enlistment contract for the National Guard will contain an oath of allegiance both to the State and to the United States, and not only enlisted men, but officers, must subscribe to such an oath. The President is not only authorized to call out the National Guard for the constitutional purposes, but is also authorized to draft them into the service of the United States, whether they desire to come or not, and also to draft the additional men that may be needed to keep such National Guard units at war strength in case the National Guard reserve authorized by this act is not sufficient for that purpose. Ample provision is made for the protection of Federal property in the hands of the National Guard, and in case property is lost or destroyed through neglect or in any other way that could have been avoided, the States must replace the property so lost.

Under the new law horses can be supplied to the mounted organizations of the National Guard, and provision is made for their care and maintenance.

The National Guard will be required to have 48 periods of armory training each year and 15 days' field training, and in case the prescribed amount of training is not undergone the President may withhold the funds appropriated for the National Guard as he sees fit. In addition to that the Secretary of War may require such additional study on the part of the officers as he may deem necessary. During periods of field training the National Guard will be paid at the same rate as the Regular Army, and for the armory training a generous rate of pay is authorized. National Guard officers and men may be sent to various service schools, and will be paid during such periods. The National Guard will be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Army of the United States from the time that they are required to come into that service, and after that time there is no evading the Federal law. A uniform system of courts-maritial for the National Guard is authorized, the limitations of which are fixed by law. This will tend to uniform procedure and practice in all the different States. When the National Guard is drafted into the service of the United States they will be entitled to all the rights of the existing pension laws.

In order to encourage target practice the Secretary of War is authorized to establish ranges and to supply rifles, ammunition, and instructors for rifle clubs in various parts of the country.

Under existing law the Federal Government in time of war would have to enter the markets of the country to obtain ammunition, arms, and other supplies, just as any ordinary individual would, but the new law authorizes the President in time of war to exercise a sort of eminent domain over the various manufacturing plants in the country and gives Government orders right of way over all private orders. It also establishes in time of peace a board of mobilization of industries which are essential for military preparedness. This board is authorized to investigate all privately owned plants in the country suitable for the manufacture of arms and ammunition, or the component parts thereof, and the Ordnance Department is authorized to prepare in time of peace the necessary gauges, jigs, dies, and other tools of special kinds that are required in the manufacture of arms, ammunition, etc.

The United States to-day is practically dependent upon Chile as a source of supply for nitrates, which are essential to the manufacture of ammunition. The new law provides that the President is authorized to investigate the best means for the production of nitrates and to proceed to the establishment of the necessary plants to manufacture nitrates for the Government's use, and the bill appropriates $20,000,000 for the establishment of such a plant.

Under the present conditions anybody can wear the uniform of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, and subject it to any indignity whatsoever. The new law provides that only certain authorized individuals and organizations shall have the right to wear this uniform or any uniform so nearly like it as to be readily mistaken therefor, and it provides certain penalties for violations of the law.

In general terms it may be said that this is the first comprehensive legislation for national defense. It provides, as far as can be foreseen, for the needs in men and material, and it has been pronounced by all who are competent to judge as the best military legislation that the country has ever had. Certain parts of it are more or less experimental, but without experiment no advance will be made, and if any part of the experiment does not work that part can be corrected by new legislation.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, May 22, 1916.

Memorandum for the Secretary of War.
Subject: Comparison of H. R. 12766 with the recommendations of the General Staff Corps.

The bill under consideration may be divided into four parts: First, the Regular Army; second, the measure for producing reserves of officers and men; third, the National Guard; and, fourth, certain measures looking for preparedness in material. The General Staff in its recommendations covered only the first two in detail and made general recommendations as regards the last two. As far as concerns the provisions for the Regular Army and the reserve features, the bill follows very closely the recommendations of the General Staff.

Sections 1 and 2, prescribing the composition of the Army and the Regular Army, are identical with the recommendations of the General Staff, except that there is a limitation placed on the strength of the Army in the proviso on page 1, lines 31 to 37 of the act, and that the percentage of unassigned recruits in the new bill is increased to 7 per cent. Under the old law the unassigned recruits were included in the strength authorized for the line, whereas under the new bill they are in addition to the strength of the line and are not included in the statutory limitation of 175,000.

Section 3, down to and including the word "necessary" on page 2, line 20, of the act, gives the organization of brigades and divisions exactly as recommended by the General Staff. From there to the end of section 3 the matter condenses the recommendations of the General Staff as regards the organization of the different headquarters and staffs therefor, giving the President full authority to prescribe in regulations what such headquarters shall be.

Section 4 prescribes the number of general officers of the line of the Army. The number of major generals is that recommended by the General Staff, except that the bill does not contain provisions for a Chief of Infantry, Chief of Cavalry, or Chief of Field Artillery. The number of brigadier generals is five less than that recommended by the General Staff. The recommendation that the Chief of Staff should be a lieutenant general was omitted from the bill.

Section 5 prescribes the General Staff Corps and authorizes a total of 57 officers instead of 121 recommended by the General Staff, but these 57 must be increased by the personnel authorized for the Inspector General's Department, consisting of 29 officers, which the General Staff had incorporated in the General Staff, but which the bill maintains as a separate department. All the recommendations of the General Staff in regard to that corps, except as above, are in the bill, and, in addition thereto, there is much other matter which was not touched upon by the General Staff.

At first sight it looks as though the provisions of section 5 greatly curtail the usefulness of the General Staff Corps, but a closer study of that section shows that what appear to be limitations are rather an emphasis of the provisions of the original bill creating the General Staff Corps. The limitation that only one-half of the officers of the General Staff shall be in Washington in a measure limits the free use of the corps and may slightly interfere with its maximum efficiency. Other than that, the provisions of the section, in the minds of many General Staff officers, will tend to increase the usefulness and efficiency of the General Staff rather than decrease it.

Section 6 prescribes the organization of The Adjutant General's Department and is identical with the recommendations of the General Staff, except that only 30 adjutants general with the rank of major are provided instead of 39 recommended by the General Staff.

Section 7: The General Staff recommended the incorporation of the Inspector General's Department in the General Staff, and therefore made no recommendations regarding that matter.

Section 8: The recommendations of the General Staff are followed exactly, except that four judge advocates with the rank of colonel are prescribed instead of the three recommended. In addition thereto the bill contains a provision for the appointment of a civilian as judge advocate, prescribes that no judge advocate shall be assigned to the study of law, and provides for certain examinations for promotion in the Judge Advocate General's Department—three provisions not included in the General Staff recommendations.

Section 9 deals with the Quartermaster Corps, and provides for 296 officers instead of 256 as recommended by the General Staff, an increase of 37 officers over that recommended. It provides that hereafter the present pay clerks shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenants, a point not covered in the General Staff recommendations. The percentages in the noncommissioned grades of the Quartermaster Corps are somewhat different from those recommended by the General Staff.

Section 10 deals with the Medical Department and is entirely different from the recommendations of the General Staff as regards the Medical Corps. The provisions for the enlisted force of the Medical Department are practically identical with those recommended by the General Staff. The provisions for the Dental Corps differ from the recommendations of the General Staff by increasing the length of service required in the different grades and by giving the dental surgeons the rank as well as the pay and allowances of the grades concerned.

Section 11 provides for the Corps of Engineers. The total number of officers provided is the same, but the numbers in the higher grades were reduced and the numbers in the lower grades increased. The organization of the engineer troops is identical with the recommendation of the General Staff.

Section 12 provides for the Ordnance Department and increases the number recommended for that department by the General Staff from 109 to 142. The original recommendation to the General Staff was received before the present war in Europe, and the larger number, 142, follows the later recommendation of the Ordnance Department, whereas the 109 follows the earlier recommendations. The bill follows the recommendation of the Chief of Staff and provides that the existing law in regard to details in the Ordnance Department shall remain as they are, whereas the General Staff recommended that this department be placed on the same basis as other departments as regards detailed officers. In addition to the officers mentioned, the bill authorizes the detail of 30 lieutenants for duty as student officers in the Ordnance Department. This was recommended by the former Secretary of War.

Section 13 provides for the Signal Corps and provides for 275 officers, whereas the General Staff recommended 381 officers, but the new bill authorizes the employment of civilian aviators which the General Staff recommendations did not include. The restrictions upon the detail of officers for aviation duty have been removed in the new bill—a measure that was contemplated by the General Staff. The extra pay recommended for rated men in the Signal Corps is not included in the new bill. The other provisions as regards the enlisted force of the Signal Corps are the same as those of the General Staff.

Section 14 provides that the Bureau of Insular Affairs shall remain as it is at present. The General Staff recommended certain changes in the detail system of that department which will be commented on in a later section.

Section 15 provides for the chaplains and leaves them subject to existing laws, whereas the General Staff had recommended that the law regarding chaplains should be practically the same as that for the Dental Corps.

Section 16 provides for the veterinarians and is the same as that recommended by the General Staff, except that service as second lieutenant is decreased by two years, as is also the service requisite for promotion to the grade of major. The limitation on the number of majors to 15 in number was omitted. The rest of this section prescribes details as to methods of appointment, transfer, and promotion in the Veterinary Corps—details which were not covered in the General Staff recommendations.

At this point in the General Staff bill there was a provision for changing the present detail system to the various staff departments. The main features were that all line officers would be required to serve two years out of every six with troops; that promotions to the grade of chiefs of the corps and departments should be made only from the grade of colonel; and that no chief of any corps, department, or bureau having served four years as such should be eligible for reappointment as chief until he had served two years as a subordinate or with troops. These provisions were practically incorporated in the Senate bill, except as regards the Ordnance Department, but the conference committee left the detail system as it stands under the present laws, except that provision was made that an officer on detail who was promoted to the next higher grade shall not for that reason alone be relieved from his detail. This was a compromise between the recommendations of those who desired the present Ordnance Department system to apply to all the corps and departments and those of the General Staff recommending that the special rules in regard to the Ordnance Department be abolished and that all corps and departments be placed on the same basis. The provisions of the new bill are exactly those recommended by the Chief of Staff to both committees, except that the Judge Advocate General's department was not put under the detail system.

Sections 17, 18, 19, and 20 deal with the composition of Infantry regiments, Cavalry regiments, Field Artillery regiments, and the Coast Artillery Corps, respectively, and, excepting the provisions made for a peace strength for Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery regiments, these sections follow exactly the recommendations of the General Staff. When it was decided that the strength of the Army should be limited to 175,000 combatant troops, the question arose immediately as to whether it would be best to decrease the number of organizations in the Regular Army or to provide for a peace establishment at about two-thirds the full strength. An examination of foreign armies showed that practically no country maintains its troops at war strength in time of peace, and it was decided that the importance of having a full commissioned personnel and the provisions of the bill regarding the Regular Army Reserve made it more desirable to maintain the number of organizations recommended by the General Staff, cutting down the strength in time of peace rather than to cut down the number of organizations and keep them at full strength. This was the unanimous recommendation at an informal meeting of several General Staff officers representing all arms.

Section 21 provides for the Porto Rico Regiment, and, except that the bill provides for the promotion of officers within that regiment, whereas the General Staff provided for their incorporation with the other Infantry of the Army, the organization of this regiment will be exactly as recommended by the General Staff.

Section 22 deals with minor subjects in which no changes were desired, and is identical with that of the General Staff.

Section 23 is identical with that of the General Staff, except that it provides that graduates of the United States Military Academy shall not be subject to the two years' probational appointment, and limits the provisional appointments to officers coming into the service as second lieutenants.

Section 24 provides that the increase in the Army shall be made in five increments, except as to the detached officers, whereas the General Staff recommended that the entire increase should be in five increments. The bill provides that, in time of emergency, the President can organize all of the increase at once—a provision which the General Staff omitted from their recommendations. The provisions in regard to the filling of vacancies is practically the same as that of the General Staff, with the following exceptions: (1) Officers of the National Guard and honor graduates of distinguished military colleges are made eligible for appointment as second lieutenant; (2) the President is authorized to recommission persons who formerly held commissions and left the service honorably; (3) examination for promotion to the grade of lieutenant colonel and colonel are required.

The new bill provides that retired officers detailed to active duty shall be given promotion on the retired list commensurate with the period that they serve on active duty.

Section 25 provides for a detached officers' list and provides for the exact number of detached officers recommended by the General Staff minus the number that were intended for the continental army. The numbers in the higher grades are increased beyond the recommendations of the General Staff, with a corresponding reduction in the numbers in the lower grades. The section follows in general the original recommendations of the General Staff, but does not follow their later recommendation that this list should be used for purposes of equalization. The testimony on the subject was so conflicting that there was no unanimity of opinion one way or the other. The new bill provides for certain equalization, but to what extent this will be possible depends upon the interpretation that is given to the section. Immediate relief will be obtained through the appointment of 17 colonels of Cavalry and 4 colonels of Infantry, who are additional to the numbers otherwise authorized. Inequalities in promotion will also be decreased by the provision which allows transfers to be made from one arm to another below the grade of lieutenant colonel for purposes of equalization.

Section 26 provides for the retirement of officers of Philippine Scouts and, although not identical with the provisions of the General Staff, it accomplishes the same purpose in a slightly different way.

Section 27 provides for enlistments in the Regular Army. The General Staff recommended a term of enlistment of 8 years, of which 2 should be with the colors and 6 in the reserve. The new bill provides for a term of 7 years' enlistment, 3 of which shall be with the colors and 4 in the reserve. The General Staff bill gave the option of reenlistment to the Secretary of War, whereas the new bill keeps it as at present with the enlisted man. The other provisions are practically the same as those recommended by the General Staff, except as to certain detail, all of which are good provisions and in no way conflict with the good of the service.

Section 28 provides for the pay of certain enlisted men in the new grades created by the bill and is identical with the recommendations of the General Staff.

Section 29 provides for the discharge of enlisted men and is the same as that recommended by the General Staff, except that the two provisos are new and are excellent provisions not covered in the General Staff recommendations.

Sections 30, 31, and 32 deal with the Regular Army Reserve and are practically identical with the recommendations of the General Staff, except that the period of training authorized for that reserve is limited to 15 days annually and that semiannual pay at the rate of $24 a year is provided for members of the reserve; they also provide that upon reporting for duty a reservist shall receive a sum equal to $3 per month for each month he may have served in the reserve.

Section 33 provides for using other departments of the Government for mobilization purposes, and is identical with that recommended by the General Staff.

Section 34 continues the existing law as regards a bonus upon reenlistment for ex-soldiers of the Army. The General Staff recommended that no bonuses be paid, but the new bill provides for a continuation of the old law.

Section 35 prohibits enlisted men in active service from entering in business or performing any services that would compete with civilians engaged in such pursuits. It is an extension of the existing law.

Section 36 provides for 1,100 sergeants for National Guard and other purposes and is identical with the General Staff recommendation.

Sections 37 to 39, inclusive, provide for an officers' reserve corps, and are practically identical with the recommendations of the General Staff.

Sections 40 to 53, inclusive, provide for the reserve officers' training corps, and are identical with the recommendations of the General Staff.

Section 54 provides for training camps, which shall be an extension of the ideas that brought about the business men's camps of 1915. The section contains all the recommendations of the Chief of Staff, but goes considerably further than he recommended in providing that all expenses in connection with the camp will be paid by the Federal Government. It is exactly what the advocates of these camps desired in case the volunteer army in time of peace was not authorized.

Section 55 provides for an enlisted reserve corps to provide a technical personnel for the armies of the United States. It embodies exactly the idea recommended by the General Staff, except that they provided it as a part of the Regular Army Reserve, whereas in the bill it is provided as a separate organization to be used in the same way as the Regular Army Reserve.

Section 56 provides for the issue of military equipment and for instructors at schools and colleges not included in the reserve officers' training corps provisions. It was not recommended by the General Staff, but interferes in no way with their recommendations.

Sections 57 to 119, inclusive, deal with the militia and the National Guard. The General Staff recommended that the National Guard be left as under the old laws and that some new Federal force be created. This idea was embodied in the volunteer army plan, known as section 56 of the Senate bill.

Both Houses of Congress wrote a new organization for the National Guard into their bills, and the sections referred to above are the substance of what was included in both bills. The provisions of these sections undoubtedly increase the power of the Federal Government over the National Guard to an enormous extent, provided that they are constitutional. Whether the National Guard will develop under the new law to the extent that its advocates claim is problematical, and time alone can tell whether the experiment will be a success or failure. The sections are so written, however, and the President has so much power in the matter that if the experiment fails the National Guard question must again come to Congress for consideration in the near future. There is no doubt but that the provisions of sections 57 to 119 are stronger and better than the so-called militia-pay bill of former years, which the War Department in a measure favored. They go farther toward federalization than that draft attempted.

Sections 120 and 121 are new matter, and provide for the preparation by the Government to obtain material of war in time of peace. The appointment of the board on mobilization of industries essential for military preparedness is a long step toward preparedness, and the authorization to the President of what is practically the right of eminent domain over industrial plants and organizations in time of war and the investigation into the subject of Government manufacture of arms and equipments are wise measures.

Section 122 provides for the appointment of a board of five retired officers to investigate and report upon past awards or issues of medals of honor by or through the War Department, and if it be found that any medal was issued for any cause other than distinguished conduct by an officer or enlisted men in action involving actual conflict with an enemy, the name of such recipient shall be stricken from the medal-of-honor list. If any person obtained the medal in a manner not authorized by law, he certainly has no right to it, and any person who obtained it in the manner authorized by law can have no objection to an investigation into the merits of the award in his case.

Section 123 provides for the acquisition of gauges, dies, jigs, special tools, etc., required in the manufacture of arms and ammunition, etc. These were not included in the General Staff bill, but the legislation is directly along the lines recommended by the General Staff after its bill was prepared.

Section 124 provides for the production of nitrates by the Federal Government. Provision for obtaining nitrates for Government purposes is wise, but whether its production in Government plants and the extension of the idea to the manufacture of fertilizers and other useful products are wise economic legislative measures are questions which are debatable, having many advocates on both sides.

Section 125 provides for the protection of the uniform of the United States Army, Navy, and Marine Corps against indignity and indiscriminate use, and is a measure that has been advocated for many years.

Section 126 increases the mileage pay to enlisted men on discharge. It was not recommended by the General Staff, but it is a more generous allowance than now given by law. The abuse of this measure can be prevented by regulations of the War Department.

The consensus of opinion in regard to this bill undoubtedly is that it is far and away the best bill that has ever been written for our Army on the subject of military organization. There undoubtedly are certain things in it which might be left out with advantage, and other things that might be added with advantage, but, nevertheless, the statement can not be controverted that it is the first and only comprehensive measure looking to military preparedness that has ever been passed by Congress.

WM. D. CONNOR,
Major, General Staff Corps.

Mr. HAY. I also call attention to an editorial from the Infantry Journal, a service paper, which also praises very much this bill, and I also ask leave to print this editorial as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE ARMY REORGANIZATION ACT.

(From the editorial department of the Infantry Journal.)

The military phase of preparedness legislation has at last reached its conclusion in the Army reorganization act of 1916, "To increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States." This enactment is unique in the history of our military legislation as the first law on our statute books which contemplated the organization of an army in time of peace. For the first time in our history, the principle is embodied in law that the peace composition of an army should be based on its war organization in order that it may be capable of employment as an effective instrument in the emergency of war and serve the purpose of an efficient military school in time of peace.

To the service at large, the adoption of this principle should be welcomed as the only basis upon which our efforts can be concentrated in the accomplishment of our common task and through which alone harmonious action can take the place of the internal wrangling that would forever defeat the most earnest efforts for efficiency. To this magazine, this phase of the legislation is a source of especial gratification as the embodiment of a principle for which it has contended since the date of its establishment. We have, however, no desire to lay claim to its final acceptance as due to any representations on our own part; indeed the validity of the principle is so patent that it must receive recognition the moment that the military problem is given any serious attention. But all process of evolution is necessarily slow. A miscellaneous aggregation only comparatively recently assembled into battalions and at most regiments from scattered frontier company posts can scarcely be expected to view itself as a complete organism and make a muster of its deficiencies.

There will perhaps be some in whose eyes the shortcomings of the bill will loom up in overshadowing proportions against its predominating excellent features. But it must be considered that the task of the legislator is an extremely difficult one. He must not only view the question from the standpoint of military necessity, but also weigh the legislative practicability of the measures which he intends to present and rally support for his program. And anyone who has observed the course of the recent legislation in its meanderings through mazes of amendments and compromises can not fail to bear away the conviction that viewed from the standpoint of what was considered possible a year ago, the provisions of the act which relate to the Regular Army constitute in the main a remarkable legislative achievement.

The Army reorganization is to be sure only an authorization, still to be realized. It is possible that it may never be completely realized. The tide has its ebb as well as its flow.

But it is enough for use for the present that an opportunity for the development of an efficient Army has been given. For years the Army has turned expectant eyes toward Congress in the hope of the legislative action which has been taken. There is no longer any reason for this attitude; the Army now has all that it can efficiently digest for many years to come. The present and the immediate future are periods for introspection and gestation. There will be no excuse on the part of the Army for failure to respond in full measure to the opportunity which it has been afforded. Its best efforts will be necessary to an efficient solution of the many problems which confront it.

Mr. HAY. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates $3,000,000 for artillery for the National Guard. At that rate of accumulation it would take over 40 years to accumulate the cannon necessary to equip a national guard of the size provided in the Hay-Chamberlain Act. This bill appropriates $3,000,000 for ammunition for the National Guard. At that rate 34 years would elapse before we accumulate sufficient artillery ammunition to equip the National Guard provided for in the Hay-Chamberlain Act.

Now, Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, came before the Committee on Military Affairs and said that we would have to appropriate $65,000,000 for field guns, at the rate of a little over $16,000,000 a year, if we wish in four years to have enough artillery ammunition to equip the National Guard provided in the Hay-Chamberlain Act. Sixty-five million dollars in bites of $16,000,000 each, on the basis of equipment specified in the old Greble Board report. The Greble Board figured out in 1911—that is, when they concluded their labors—the amount of artillery and artillery ammunition and small-arms ammunition which was needed to equip American troops in time of war. The board figured on an army of about 500,000 men at the outbreak of war. That was the Greble Board report. But the Greble Board report is out of date. There is a new estimate for us to go on. The Treat Board has recently concluded its labors in the light of the lessons learned in the European war.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman will recall that the Hay-Chamberlain Act as adopted in conference extended this to five years instead of four.

Mr. GARDNER. It was extended, as the gentleman says, to five years, but Gen. Crozier pointed out that the appropriations for ammunition ought to be made in the next four years, even though the proposed army would not be raised until five years are elapsed. It takes a good while to make ammunition after it is ordered.

As I said, Gen. Crozier not only pointed out that it would cost $65,000,000 to accumulate in four years the ammunition requisite for the National Guard if we stick to the old Greble Board estimates, but he said it would cost twice as much, or $134,000,000, to equip the National Guard in four years if we adopted the estimates which he recently submitted to the Secretary of War. These estimates represented the findings of the Treat Board, considerably pared down by Gen. Crozier. Let me tell you about the Treat Board.

The Treat Board was a board of Army officers, like the Greble Board, under the presidency of Col. Treat. Secretary Garrison last year appointed this board to get together and tell us how much artillery we needed to accumulate for our Army for each division. That Treat Board got together and they made a report, and that report went to Gen. Crozier. Gen. Crozier cut that report way down. He cut it down to the bone in some respects. When he cut it down as far as he thought it right to cut it down, then it was taken to the Secretary of War.

The Treat Board recommendations as modified by Gen. Crozier required $134,000,000 in four years to equip the National Guard with the requisite artillery ammunition to be accumulated in anticipation of possible war—$134,000,000 in four years, and you have given $3,000,000. That is why I said it would take 40 years to equip your Army under the basis laid down in the Treat Board report as modified by Gen. Crozier before he submitted it to the Secretary of War. I purpose reading you the correspondence between Gen. Crozier and myself a little later, so that there will be no doubt. Now, Gen. Crozier asked for only $1,600,000 for machine guns for the National Guard, and the committee has not given a cent. There is not one cent carried in this bill. The machine-gun appropriation for the Regular Army in this bill is only $1,400,000. As you heard the chairman say, it is calculated on the basis of 5 machine guns for a regiment, while the calculations of our War Department are now 12 machine guns to a regiment, to say nothing of a wastage allowance to supply losses in time of war.

Here is my correspondence with Gen. Crozier:

JUNE 20, 1916.

MY DEAR GEN. CROZIER: If I understand the recent hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs aright, the following is a synopsis of the amounts which you asked to have appropriated for the next fiscal year for field artillery and field artillery ammunition for the National Guard:

For the field artillery you stated that $16,800,000 ought to be appropriated, if Congress wished to continue to appropriate for field artillery on the basis recommended by the Greble Board some years ago. You stated, however, that if Congress wished to adopt the recommendations as to field artillery recently submitted by you to the Secretary of War, then it would be necessary to double the above amount and appropriate approximately $33,000,000. Instead of the foregoing amount I note that the Army appropriation bill recently reported carries only $3,000,000 for the field artillery of the National Guard.

As to field-artillery ammunition, if I understand the hearings correctly, you asked for $8,000,000 wherewith to secure artillery ammunition for the National Guard to be used in case of war. You stated, however, that if the new estimates as to artillery necessities recently submitted by you to the Secretary of War are to be accepted the proper appropriation would be about $26,000,000. Instead of the foregoing amount I note that the Army appropriation bill recently reported carries only $3,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition for the National Guard.

I understand that the estimates which you have recently submitted to the Secretary of War are a slight modification of the estimates recently made by the so-called Treat Board, a board of officers convened by Secretary Garrison to estimate the amount of ordnance which should be accumulated as a reserve by the United States prior to the outbreak of war. The Greble Board, I understand, was a board of the same nature as the Treat Board, except that its conclusions were arrived at prior to the European war. In other words, your recent recommendations made to the Secretary of War are based on the lessons of the European war and if adopted would require an expenditure in behalf of the National Guard of approximately $132,000,000 for field artillery and $104,000,000 for field-artillery ammunition, your idea being that this amount should be appropriated by Congress in four annual installments.

Am I correct in supposing that at the rate of appropriation provided in the current Army appropriation bill it would take approximately 40 years to accumulate the National Guard Artillery which you have recommended to the Secretary of War and approximately 34 years to accumulate the National Guard Artillery ammunition? I understand that your estimates submitted to the Secretary of War are based on the supposition that the United States is to have an Army of the size recently provided for in the Hay-Chamberlain Act.

Please advise me as to what extent my understanding of the recent hearings is correct.

Very respectfully,

_____.

Brig. Gen. WILLIAM CROZIER, U. S. A.,
Chief, Bureau of Ordnance, Washington, D. C.

To that letter I received this answer:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GARDNER: Replying to your letter of June 20, I can say that you have correctly understood my statement made before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives on April 4, 1916, to the effect that $16,800,000 should be appropriated for Field Artillery for the National Guard in order to supply the amount called for under the Greble Board's standards for the force contemplated by the bill H. R. 12766—the Army reorganization bill—in four years' time, and that in order to make a similar provision in accordance with the Treat Board's standards, as subsequently modified by my recommendation, approximately double this sum would be required.

In regard to field artillery ammunition for the National Guard, you have correctly understood my statement that $8,000,000 should be appropriated in order to supply, in four annual installments, the ammunition required for the National Guard under the Greble Board's standards, the force being the same as mentioned above. I did not, however, state that under the Treat Board's standards, as modified by myself, this sum should be $26,000,000, although that figure happens to be approximately correct.

Your understanding also is correct that the figures, in regard to these items, which I recommended to the Secretary of War, are a modification of somewhat larger estimates which had been submitted by the Treat Board, above mentioned. The Treat Board was, as you suppose, a board of the same nature as the Greble Board, but its conclusions were arrived at some time after the commencement of the European war, whereas the Greble Board's conclusions were submitted in 1911.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

Gen. WILLIAM CROZIER,
Chief of Ordnance, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: In examining the recent hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, I note that, on page 771, you ask for appropriation of $1,670,300 for automatic rifles for the National Guard, and in addition for an appropriation of $1,400,000 for automatic rifles for the Regular Army. Elsewhere in the hearings I note that you say that these calculations are based on an allowance of five automatic rifles for each regiment. Is the War Department now in possession of sufficient data to enable it to determine whether or not this allowance is adequate?

Sincerely, yours,

——— ———

To which the Chief of Ordnance replied:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ORDNANCE,
Washington, June 20, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. GARDNER: Answering your inquiry of June 20, in regard to the allowance of automatic machine rifles per regiment, I can say that, since my hearing of last April before the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, to which you refer in your letter, the War Department has acted anew upon the subject of the allowance of these rifles per regiment, and has increased this allowance from approximately 5 per regiment to approximately 12.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM CROZIER,
Brigadier General, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the hearings before the committee, Gen. Crozier expressed his own opinion that we ought to have at least 12 machine guns for each regiment. (See p. 770, hearings on Army appropriation bill, Apr. 4, 1916.)

If anybody wishes to ask me any questions I shall be very glad to answer.

Mr. SANFORD. Can the gentleman tell us, approximately, how many men under this appropriation would be available for the mobile Regular Army outside of the number of men necessary for our insular possessions and Alaska? Approximately, how many fighting men?

Mr. GARDNER. I regret to say that the calculations have gone out of my mind. This bill appropriates for 105,000 enlisted men of the line. Of course, they are very largely Coast Artillery and troops over sea. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can answer.

Mr. SANFORD. Thirty or forty thousand.

Mr. GARDNER. I should say more, judging by the number they have collected at the Mexican border. There they have taken Coast Artillery men and turned them into Infantry. Of course, if we were liable to sea attack we could not do that. In that case the gentleman would be perfectly right. I doubt whether in that case there would be a mobile Army of over 40,000 outside of the Coast Artillery. When we read the bill I expect to enter into a discussion of the number of troops now available, and why more were not appropriated for.

Mr. GORDON. Does the gentleman think that this Congress ought to delegate to Army officers the function of determining what is necessary for the defense of this country?

Mr. GARDNER. I think it would be the wisest thing we can do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman please answer what is the number of men in the National Guard that he has computed for? For what number of men does he compute?

Mr. GARDNER. I believe that the National Guard is to consist of somewhere between 425,000 and 470,000 men. It was Gen. Crozier, not I, who made this calculation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And how many are in the National Guard at the present time?

Mr. GARDNER. About 120,000, I think.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it be the gentleman's idea to provide for 460,000 men in the National Guard when there are only approximately one-third of that number in the National Guard?

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman's mind is a little confused about what the reserve ammunition is for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes?

Mr. GARDNER. If we go to war, we shall need this ammunition for the National Guard or the Volunteers, whichever force does the fighting. The estimates are based on an army of the size of the National Guard plus the Regular Army. In other words, we have got to have reserve ammunition for at least half a million men, whether you call the soldiers Volunteers or whether you call them National Guardsmen, and the reserve of ammunition must be accumulated before the war. Everybody agrees that we shall need at least half a million men if war breaks out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but suppose war does not break out?

Mr. GARDNER. Then you do not need anything at all. Or, supposing we only fight with little fellows. If we will fight only with little fellows, then we shall not need this large amount.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is what I wish to understand, whether the gentleman's estimate was for a peace footing or for a war footing.

Mr. GARDNER. My estimate was for a real war, what the country wants preparedness against.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I agree with the gentleman that we want preparedness.

Mr. GARDNER. What would the gentleman do—provide ammunition after the war started? We have seen enough of that in Europe.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should not. I should say get it before.

Mr. KREIDER. Speaking of machine guns, is the machine gun now possessed by the United States an efficient gun? I understand we have about 1,020 of them.

Mr. GARDNER. No; that is the number authorized.

Mr. KREIDER. How many machine guns have we?

Mr. GARDNER. I should have to look it up.

Mr. HAY. We have 1,077.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not that the authorized number?

Mr. HAY. I think all of them are made except 282.

Mr. GARDNER. Then, that makes a little over 700. I got the figures from the War Department the other day. I will put them in the RECORD.

[N. B.—The exact figures—952 machine guns complete and 125 more authorized by Congress, 1,077 in all.]

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman know anything about the efficiency of these guns?

Mr. GARDNER. I know something, not a great deal. I am not an expert, but I can give the gentleman a short sketch of the machine gun, as far as I understand it.

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman know whether it is true that these machine guns are not of sufficient reliability so that we can depend upon them, or whether they will heat when fired and become useless?

Mr. GARDNER. I will tell the gentleman as best I can. Two of the Benet-Mercié guns jammed down on the Mexican border. Like all machine guns they are very complicated. There are two little nicks into which the edges of the strip which carries the cartridges must slide with nicety, otherwise the gun will jam. As a matter of fact, two of them jammed in the dark. You may say that we ought not to have machine guns which will jam in the dark, but they tell me that it is very doubtful whether any country in the world has a machine gun which will not jam in the dark, unless under exceptionally trained treatment. I do not know about the Lewis gun, except what I read in the papers in a general way. I do not know whether the Lewis gun is a better gun than the Benet-Mercié gun or not. Some of the very best men in the Army believe that the Benet-Mercié gun is the best gun we can have. Any machine gun is a most complicated piece of machinery. Really we ought to have men trained very highly before we can depend on their handling of these machine guns. Whether there is any better machine gun anywhere else than we have I do not know.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Mexican situation is one of great interest just at present. We have had several years of watchful waiting and some discussion in the House and in the country at various times as to what was going on in Mexico. I am going to say just a word in reference to the progress of the revolution in Mexico, and I shall read what I say so as to be very careful that I am correct:

The progress of the revolution in Mexico: Continuous bloodshed and disorders have marked its progress. For three years the Mexican Republic has been torn with civil strife; the lives of Americans and other aliens have been sacrificed; vast properties developed by American capital and enterprise have been destroyed or rendered nonproductive; bandits have been permitted to roam at will through the territory contiguous to the United States and to seize, without punishment or without effective attempt at punishment, the property of Americans, while the lives of citizens of the United States who ventured to remain in Mexican territory or to return there to protect their interests have been taken, and in some cases barbarously taken, and the murderers have neither been apprehended nor brought to justice. It would be difficult to find in the annals of the history of Mexico conditions more deplorable than those which have existed there during these recent years of civil war.

It would be tedious to recount instance after instance, outrage after outrage, atrocity after atrocity, to illustrate the true nature and extent of the widespread conditions of lawlessness and violence which have prevailed. During the past nine months in particular, the frontier of the United States along the lower Rio Grande has been thrown into a state of constant apprehension and turmoil because of frequent and sudden incursions into American territory and depredations and murders on American soil by Mexican bandits who have taken the lives and destroyed the property of American citizens, sometimes carrying American citizens across the international boundary with the booty seized. American garrisons have been attacked at night, American soldiers killed and their equipment and horses stolen; American ranches have been raided, property stolen and destroyed, and American trains wrecked and plundered. The attacks on Brownsville, Red House Ferry, Progreso post office, and Las Peladas, all occurring during September last, are typical. In these attacks on American territory, Carrancista adherents, and even Carrancista soldiers took part in the looting, burning, and killing. Not only were these murders characterized by ruthless brutality but uncivilized acts of mutilation were perpetrated.

Representations were made to Gen. Carranza and he was emphatically requested to stop these reprehensible acts in a section which has long claimed to be under the complete domination of his authority. Notwithstanding these representations and the promise of Gen. Nafarrete to prevent attacks along the international boundary, in the following month of October a passenger train was wrecked by bandits and several persons killed 7 miles north of Brownsville, and an attack was made upon United States troops at the same place several days later. Since these attacks leaders of the bandits well known both to Mexican civil and military authorities as well as to American officers have been enjoying with impunity the liberty of the towns of northern Mexico. So far has the indifference of the de facto government to these atrocities gone that some of these leaders have received not only the protection of that government but encouragement and aid as well.

Depredations upon American persons and property within Mexican jurisdiction have been still more numerous.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not read my remarks any further. I have simply read a statement addressed by the Government of the United States yesterday to the de facto government in Mexico, and if the statements therein are true, as I believe they are, it is to the everlasting shame of the American Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation bill as presented to the House by the committee calls for the amount of money which will be necessary to pay the military expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, for the support of the Regular Army Establishment and the Organized Militia, or National Guard, at its existing strength to-day, as well as the first increment that was provided by the new Army reorganization bill.

In my opinion, the amount of money providing for the payment of 105,000 enlisted men in the Regular Establishment will be found ample. I do not believe that the department will be successful in enlisting men in excess of that number during the next year, but if they are it is a very easy matter, indeed, for Congress to provide for their payment by a subsequent bill. It is customarily taken care of in one of the deficiency bills.

There are many reasons why there is difficulty in enlisting the maximum number of men in the Regular Army to-day. The greatest reason why there is this difficulty lies in the way the Regular Army has been stationed and allowed to stagnate doing trivial police duty on the Mexican border. It has been the policy of the War Department, and in my opinion it has been a most stupid blunder, to attempt to police the entire border by scattering the Regular Army along its entire length, a mere police guard. It is a well-known fact that, instead of 50,000 men being sufficient for that kind of duty, it would require a half a million men to make a mere airtight defensive patrol. It has been a mere defensive police force for three long years, instead of being allowed to actively pursue, punish, and exterminate the bandits and cattle thieves which have crossed the border.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I was surprised to hear the gentleman state that this bill provided for a strength of the Regular Army for the coming year——

Mr. ANTHONY. Not strength, but pay.

Mr. HILL. That means strength, for you will not have men that are not paid.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we succeed in getting an excess of the estimated number, Congress will readily provide the additional pay in a deficiency bill.

Mr. HILL. But Congress may not be in session. What I want to know is whether I correctly understood the gentleman that this bill provides for the pay of only 105,000 men during the coming year.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. HILL. That is, 20,000 that we authorized last February; 5,000 more out of the 175,000 or 206,000, whatever it was, that we authorized the other day.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman's assumption is correct, but the committee only hopes that the War Department will succeed in enlisting the remaining maximum strength, and if they do, means will be found for their payment.

Mr HILL. But you can do that only by further legislation.

Mr. HAY. If the gentleman will permit me, they can create a deficiency in the pay of the Army.

Mr. HILL. I think the country misunderstands the purpose and object of the Army reorganization bill which was passed the other day.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will permit, in my opinion, if the administration will change its policy of merely policing the Mexican border and chasing a few irresponsible bandits in northern Mexico and will decide on a positive and definite line of action as affecting the American Army on the border and in Mexico, there will be no trouble in recruiting the Army up to its maximum strength. The trouble has been that they have been scattered along the border in small detachments, in uncomfortable camps, performing most disagreeable duty, until they have been permitted to stagnate; and so many of the men have refused to reenlist when their terms expired. The policy of the department in this respect has been a great and severe injury to the morale of the Army on the border. Instead of such a miserable policy of inaction and indecision a policy of strong and aggressive action should have been pursued. If retributive justice had been promptly meted out to every marauding band that crossed the border, and had been the rule at the beginning three years ago, it would not have required one-quarter of the men to handle the situation now.

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Did not they send troops in keeping with the dignity of this country after Villa and his crowd?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but if the gentleman can point to any accomplishment so far of that expedition in ameliorating conditions in Mexico, I would be glad for him to do so. The trouble has been that the Army has been used as a mere police force chasing a few individual offenders, and the sooner that idea is done away with and some broad policy of reformation and reconstruction commenced the better it will be for the American Army and the better it will be both for the people and Government of Mexico and the United States as well. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. If Villa is the only one that we went after in this punitive expedition, how long would it have been before we had him if we had offered $100,000 for him dead or alive?

Mr. ANTHONY. That would have been the most effective undoubtedly, I will say to the gentleman; but the mere personality of Villa is but an incident in the whole Mexican question. The trouble is that the administration has not been able to see the great, big, broad, humanitarian side and aspect of that question down there. It is not the mere punishment of one bandit, but it is a matter of restoring peace and order and good government to a stricken nation on our borders. It is a duty that we owe to humanity as well as to our own citizens to bring about a proper condition of affairs, so that not only the 15,000,000 Mexican people can enjoy peace and prosperity but American lives and property made safe in Mexico and the dignity and honor of the United States preserved as well.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, what business has the President of the United States to send an army into a foreign country for the purpose of furnishing them with good government?

Mr. ANTHONY. The President of the United States, in my opinion, does not do his duty if he allows an American citizen engaged in peaceful and law-abiding pursuits at any place on the face of the globe to suffer insult, injury, and damage to life and property. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GORDON. Oh, well, but the gentleman does not understand my question, and he has not answered it. What right has the President of the United States to send the Army of the United States into a foreign country to create this beautiful condition that the gentleman has just described?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that legally the President of the United States probably has not any right, but every President in the history of the country has always exercised it when the emergency confronted him.

Mr. GORDON. Never has a President of the United States done that in any foreign country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, by the same token, what right had the President of the United States to tell the provisional president of another country to get out of office until somebody else was found that would be satisfactory to the President of the United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. He assumed that right, as I endeavored to tell the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman point to the words whereby the President ever did any such thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. We can point to the acts. We do not need to point to the words. He sent the Army to Vera Cruz.

Mr. FESS. I should like to recall to the mind of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that the President said from the Speaker's rostrum in our hearing that Huerta must go, and it could not be any clearer than that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly the President took that position.

Mr. HARDY. Just one moment in reference to that. Unquestionably the President has always believed that Mr. Huerta should go, and said so to Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; and, in my opinion, that was the first great blunder the President made. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. That is a question of opinion, and the gentleman has a right to his opinion.

Mr. ANTHONY. And history has demonstrated that it was a blunder. I want to say to the gentleman that, in my opinion, Victoriano Huerta was the only powerful figure developed in the revolutionary struggles in Mexico who showed capacity to properly handle the situation [applause on the Republican side], and that man should have been recognized; but, instead of that, the President has attempted to do business, one after another, with every single bandit leader who has popped up in momentary authority, and, instead of getting cooperation from those men with whom he has attempted to do business, they have turned around and kicked him in the face until now every one of them has gone back on him and he finds himself without a single Mexican friend or ally; and it is up to the President of the United States, in my opinion, to use a common phrase, to "fish or cut bait."

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one question? If Huerta was such a wonderfully competent man, why didn't your President Taft recognize him? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas—let me refresh his history and his dates—that President Madero was assassinated just nine days before the expiration of the term of office of President Taft. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. And let me say, further, that President Huerta was more firmly fixed in power immediately after that assassination than ever afterwards.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why did not your President recognize Huerta and do the proper thing?

Mr. HARDY. Why did not your President do it?

Mr. ANTHONY. He did not have time.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, did not have time!

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman does not doubt, does he, that Huerta reached the presidency by exercising the forces of assassination?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not know anything about that. Suppose he did rise to his power by assassination. All of the men in Mexico with whom the President has subsequently attempted to ally himself with have been admitted murderers, assassins, bandits, and thieves, if not actually, by countenancing and condoning such conditions. Victoriano Huerta stood out as the one great, strong figure—head and shoulders above them all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Then the gentleman knows that the immediate consequence of the assassination of Madero was the rise to power of Huerta?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; he was the strong man who seized the reins of government at that time in that emergency.

Mr. GARRETT. And the gentleman would have the President of the United States recognize as the head of another Government one who rose to his place and power by use of the force of assassination?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no; I would not proceed upon that basis, but I would recognize conditions as they are. I do not think it is any part or business of our country to interfere with the internal conditions in other countries unless the matter of American lives and American property is at stake.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether or not England, France, Russia, and Japan did not all recognize Huerta, and whether or not Diaz did not assume the same power after the extinction and murder of his predecessor?

Mr. ANTHONY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. And I should like to know the chief occupation at the present time of those countries that recognized Huerta.

Mr. KREIDER. Is it not a fact that Gen. Huerta was elected legally, according to the constitution of Mexico?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. And is it not a fact that the constitution of Mexico provides that in case of the death or resignation of both the president and the vice president, the Congress of Mexico shall elect a president, and is it not a fact that is exactly what occurred; and is it not also a fact that our administration went there and deliberately dictated to the people of Mexico, stating that the man whom the Congress of Mexico had elected was illegally elected, and did it not undertake to unhorse him? Mr. Chairman, this administration has sown the wind and it is reaping the whirlwind. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARRETT. "In the event of death" is quite significant in that connection.

Mr. KREIDER. "Or resignation," and the resignation occurred before the death.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield for one more question, and then I would like to say a word or two about the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. To the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has information that I want him now to disclose. Has it ever been known or well established that Huerta in any way conspired to the death of Madero?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further to any member of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will yield for one question only.

Mr. DAVIS of Texas. I represent 1,300 miles of Mexican border, and I just wanted to call attention to the fact that Huerta wired President Taft, "I have overthrown the government and am now in charge." He was the Guiteau of that country.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, I do not know about that. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. And that is in reference to why President Taft did not recognize Huerta. Is it not true, as the newspapers carried it on the 23d of February, that President Taft consulted President-elect Wilson as to what he wanted him to do, as to whether he should do anything, and it was the request of the President-elect not to take any steps? That was carried in all the press of the country.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman I have been so informed, and I believe he took no action out of consideration of the President-elect.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I prefer to finish my remarks and to yield at the end of that time, if possible.

Mr. DECKER. I just wanted to know, if the gentleman were President, if he would have recognized Huerta after he wired the President that he had overthrown the Government and was in charge? I wanted to know the gentleman's views.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would certainly have given such recognition at the proper time. Now, Mr. Chairman, there are some points of difference between the majority and minority, perhaps, on the appropriation bill before the House, but they are not very great. It has been claimed, and some Members of the minority feel that perhaps the appropriations for field artillery, ammunition, and field artillery for the National Guard are not as large as they should be, but in justice to the action which the committee took I want to say that sufficient appropriation has been provided by the committee for those two items in conjunction with the money which has already been appropriated by the Fortifications Committee to keep every arsenal, every Government ammunition factory, every Government powder factory running on full time for the next year in order to use up this money, and if additional money is appropriated that money will have to be expended under private contracts.

Another thing. The House must take under consideration the fact that never were the facilities of this country so good and so great as they are now for the manufacture of arms, artillery, and ammunition, and, as Gen. Crozier stated to our committee the other day, when the item of the automatic machine guns was up, he did not think there was any great hurry about proceeding to the manufacture of a great number of those guns because immense American factories were in process of construction or are now under operation on foreign contracts to the capacity of producing very great numbers of these important arms, which this Government could acquire in sufficient number to arm its forces if any emergency arose in the very shortest possible time.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I saw a statement in one of the Chicago papers this morning to the effect that a number of machine-gun companies had been organized out of the militia, and that there was not a single machine gun to be supplied to those companies.

Mr. ANTHONY. And that is not true. The Army has a thousand machine guns already available——

Mr. GARDNER. Is that correct?

Mr. ANTHONY. And as the National Guard companies are organized the department will be able to supply them with machine guns.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman correct in saying——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has all the time expired on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. HAY. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, about five minutes.

Mr. HAY. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is all right; we will take time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAY. And I wanted some to explain about these guns. I will yield the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That will be sufficient.

Mr. GARDNER. Is the gentleman sure about there being a thousand machine guns already available?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so.

Mr. GARDNER. I think it was stated there were 1,088 authorized.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, either they had them or they were authorized.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, that is a very different thing from having them available.

Mr. ANTHONY. Gen. Crozier coupled with that the statement that we could get machine guns instantly——

Mr. GARDNER. If we could buy them.

Mr. ANTHONY. That manufacturing facilities are so great in this country that they could be instantly provided.

Mr. GARDNER. He asked $1,600,000, and you did not give it to him.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say another word to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He speaks about taking 40 years to supply the National Guard of this country with field artillery at the rate it is being appropriated for. The gentleman hardly believes that statement——

Mr. GARDNER. Absolutely.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then, if the gentleman will take into consideration the figures of the Treat Board as applied to a National Guard of about 400,000, and it calls for 4.6 guns per thousand, for that number of men would be 1,680 guns. The appropriations made this year by the two committees provide for a total of nearly 400 field guns, if my figures are correct, for both the Regular Army and the militia, and the Regular Army now has practically enough guns for the force we have.

Mr. GARDNER. I will read to the gentleman, if he will allow me, the statement of Gen. Crozier.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that I have not the slightest objection personally to increasing these two appropriations. In fact I should be willing to vote for a reasonable and adequate increase in them, but I do not think it can be taken to be a public emergency for which sufficient appropriations have not been made, because of the fact that the manufacturing capacity of the country at large to-day is so great, and the output of munitions of war is so large, that we can abundantly provide ourselves in an emergency.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Does the gentleman recall that Gen. Crozier stated as one of the reasons why we are not manufacturing more machine guns that the manufacturers of this country have equipped and qualified themselves so that they are ready to furnish an almost unlimited quantity of the very best machine guns, of the kind being used in Europe, so that if we need them we can buy them in unlimited quantities?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Let me read from page 784 of the hearings:

Mr. MCKELLAR. How much are the 212 batteries to cost?

Mr. KAHN. $22,093,588. I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. And $66,978,151 is the cost of all of them. You are asking now for one-fourth of that $66,000,000.

Gen. CROZIER. I am asking for approximately one-fourth of that $66,000,000 now; and that figure, Mr. Chairman, I will remind you, relates to the Greble Board of standards.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Gen. CROZIER. If you adopt the standards of the Treat Board, as they were modified by myself, that figure would have to be just about doubled.

Making $133,000,000. Now, if you will divide 3,000,000 into 133,000,000, what is the quotient? Over 40 years, is it not?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is perhaps a difference of opinion between the committee and some of the experts of the War Department as to the amount of ammunition and the number of guns we should have in reserve.

Mr. GARDNER. Very likely; but the gentleman said that my statement about taking 40 years to accumulate a sufficient supply was incorrect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe it is incorrect.

Mr. GARDNER. Well, I have just shown the gentleman that it is not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that there has been injected into this debate the political phase of it with regard to our relations with Mexico. The President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson, has pursued toward Mexico a policy which up to this time has had the confidence and the backing of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side, and cries of "No!" "No!" on the Republican side.] Gentlemen on the other side of the House have never had a policy about it, and they have not one now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They are very much opposed to the President when he is at peace, and now that they think there is going to be a war they are very much more opposed to that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will not yield. The President of the United States has the situation in hand. He is going to pursue a course which will bring peace and honor to the United States, and, I trust, peace to distracted Mexico. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The fact that to-day all over this country thousands of young men are rushing to join the National Guard for the purpose of service in Mexico is an assurance that the people believe that what the President has done is right. What he has done is right, and what he will do will be right. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingencies of the Army: For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, exclusive of personal services in the War Department, or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., arising at home or abroad, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $25,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph, for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman of Virginia to the last portion of it, which provides for the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4. I do this for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that this is now the general law. I have no objection to the provision, but if we continue to reenact that provision of the general law in this bill it will tend to cause confusion, and possible doubt as to other lump sums which are being carried in other bills, a portion of which is used for a similar purpose.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that this provision has been carried in this bill in these words for many years. I hope he will not make the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall not, of course, if the gentleman insists on retaining it in the bill; but, as I have stated, it is the general law now, and as I view it it is wholly unnecessary to carry it in this bill. I want to state this to the gentleman in further explanation of my action: In consideration of another bill where lump sums have been provided, attention has been called to this same provision, and the question has been raised as to whether it was so carried because some one doubted whether or not they had the right to pay a per diem allowance of $4 per day under the general law. It was only for that reason that I wanted to call it to the attention of the gentleman on this occasion.

Mr. HAY. I had not had my attention called to it, but I should like to have it remain in the bill, and when it is considered again I will call the attention of the Secretary of War to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee withdraw his point of order?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of military observers abroad: For the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign States at war, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $15,000.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. What is the total amount appropriated in this bill?

Mr. HAY. One hundred and fifty-seven million dollars.

Mr. HILL. How much is that in excess of last year?

Mr. HAY. Fifty-six million dollars.

Mr. HILL. How much of that is due to so-called preparation, and how much would the bill have carried, probably, if there had been no excitement or occasion to make additional appropriations on that account?

Mr. HAY. It would have been about the same as it was last year, I take it, about $100,000,000.

Mr. HILL. My reason for asking the question is that by and by we are going to have some tax bills come in here. I presume perhaps the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] can tell us about those.

Mr. GARNER. We hope to bring in a revenue bill that will be so satisfactory that even the gentleman from Connecticut will vote for it.

Mr. HILL. It will probably be a bill for a large amount, and I am heartily in favor of giving the administration all the money that it needs to protect and defend this country properly now, regardless of what has occurred in Mexico heretofore. We will fight out on the stump the question as to what has occurred before. Here in this House now I propose to stand by the proposition to give the Government all the money that it needs, but I want to vote intelligently by and by as to how much the Government will need, and for that reason I have asked the gentleman the question. I am very sorry that the appropriation bill does not provide for the largest possible force which can be secured under the provisions of the act that the gentleman from Virginia brought in here and successfully passed the other day.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman will understand that this bill does provide for the pay of as many men as are expected to be enlisted in the Army during the next fiscal year.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman says "as many men as are expected to be enlisted." He ought to bear in mind the fact that when the naval bill was up the other day I offered an amendment providing for giving a bounty to get men enough to man the ships that we have, and that amendment was turned down by the House. Yet this very day in the newspapers it is announced that that amount is to be largely exceeded by the Senate before the naval bill gets back to us for consideration. I have not the slightest doubt but that the same thing will occur with regard to this bill, and I wish the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to have the honor and credit of fully meeting the exigencies of the occasion instead of waiting to have that done in the Senate.

Mr. HAY. I will state to the gentleman from Connecticut that this bill, so far as the Committee on Military Affairs have been able to ascertain, carries every dollar that the department thinks will be needed for the next fiscal year. Now, there is a difference of opinion perhaps as to the reserve supply. That is another question; but as to the running and current expenses for the next fiscal year for the Army, this bill carries every dollar necessary.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman is authorized to appropriate for 120,000 men this year, is he not?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HILL. He has only appropriated for 105,000. Why?

Mr. HAY. Because the War Department only asked for an appropriation for 105,000 men.

Mr. HILL. Is the gentleman governed entirely by that opinion or does he use his own judgment?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Connecticut has been here for many years, and he has never known any Appropriation Committee to exceed the amount asked for by the department.

Mr. HILL. If the appropriation were made for the full amount allowed by law and it should not all of it be expended, there would be no harm done, would there?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman knows very well that it is not the custom of this House to appropriate large sums of money with the idea that they will not be expended.

Mr. HILL. But the situation now is very exceptional. It has been the custom in time of war to do so. We appropriated $50,000,000 at the begining of the Spanish War in five minutes.

Mr. HAY. We are not at war, and if the administration asks for any addition to this bill on account of the situation in Mexico nobody will be quicker than I to respond to the request.

Mr. HILL. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say so.

Mr. HAY. I have not been asked to do anything of that kind.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the War Department does not know nor does anybody else know how many enlisted men are authorized by the Hay-Chamberlain Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917. I hold in my hand a letter from Gen. McCain which I shall present to the House to-day. You will find that instead of having over 200,000 enlisted men of the line in the Regular Army, as the country thinks we are shortly going to have, the true figure will not exceed 120,000 prior to the 1st of July, 1917. That is the outside figure, 120,000. Neither the War Department nor anybody else in any figures that I have seen, not even the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, claims that the number can lawfully exceed 120,000. That is, under existing law we can enlist no more than that number, even if recruits swarm in to our hearts' content. Even if recruits were to come in swarms, even if we should appropriate $100,000,000, unless we change the law, we shall not get a greater Army than 120,000 enlisted combatants at the outside prior to July 1, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That purchase of typewriting machines, to be paid for from this appropriation, may be made at the special price allowed to schools teaching stenography and typewriting without obligating typewriter companies to supply these machines to all departments of the Government at the same price.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph just read for the purpose of obtaining some information. What is the special need of making provision to have typewriting machines purchased at a special price?

Mr. HAY. It is merely a matter of getting them more cheaply.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the legislative bill passed this session we made some general provision for the purchase of typewriting machines below the regular price at which they are offered, and I thought that provision would cover this paragraph.

Mr. HAY. This paragraph gets them much cheaper than they do under the general law or the provision to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee at what price they will be furnished?

Mr. HAY. No; I can not. The Chief of the Coast Artillery at the hearings stated that he could buy the machines much cheaper if he could get this provision in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume that these typewriters are used especially for school purposes or allied school purposes, and that brings the rate furnished by the typewriting-machine companies to schools?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER.

Signal Service of the Army: For expenses of the Signal Service of the Army, as follows: Purchase, equipment, and repair of field electric telegraphs, radio installations, signal equipments and stores, binocular glasses, telescopes, heliostats, and other necessary instruments, including necessary meteorological instruments for use on target ranges; professional and scientific books of reference, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, and maps, for use in the office of the Chief Signal Officer; war balloons and airships and accessories, including their maintenance and repair; telephone apparatus (exclusive of exchange service) and maintenance of the same; electrical installations and maintenance at military posts; fire-control and direction apparatus and material for Field Artillery; maintenance and repair of military lines and cables, including salaries of civilian employees, supplies, general repairs, reserved supplies, and other expenses connected with the duty of collecting and transmitting information for the Army by telegraph or otherwise, $1,775,000: Provided, however, That not more than $1,222,100 of the foregoing appropriation shall be used for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, operation, and repair of airships and other aerial machines and accessories necessary in the aviation section; and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled, passenger-carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the aviation section: Provided further, That not to exceed $50,000 of the above sum will be available for the payment of all expenses in connection with the development of a suitable type of aviation motor, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on this portion of the paragraph beginning, on line 20, as follows: "professional scientific books of reference, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, and maps for use in the office of Chief Signal Officer."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is distinctly within the jurisdiction of another committee, and appropriations have already been made for it.

Mr. HAY. I would like to have the gentleman show me where the appropriations have been made.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It has been made under the head of "Contingent expenses for the War Department, $45,000," for this and other purposes.

Mr. HAY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to obtain some information particularly as to the progress that is being made relative to motors for aeroplanes. We have here a limitation not to exceed $50,000 for the development of a suitable type of aviation motor.

Mr. HAY. The aviation motor is the thing which has been most troublesome in the development of aviation machines. The purpose of this is to have the War Department test out as far as possible every type of aviation motor in order to find out which is the best.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the plan of the Government to engage in the manufacture of any special motor?

Mr. HAY. No; I think not. It is the purpose to have the department investigate and have made under their direction, perhaps, such an aviation motor as they may think best to use in these Army aeroplanes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am somewhat acquainted with the work that is being done by the Navy in connection with aviation matters and the experimentations that are going on in that department, and I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether there is any cooperation between the two arms of the service in this line of activity?

Mr. HAY. Not that I know of.

Mr. MANN. Well, there is. Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that I may be able to make an interesting contribution upon this subject, just for a moment.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the committee would be very glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I expect that what I have to say will possibly develop the reason for this item in the bill. We are making a good many aeroplanes for shipment to Europe, but none of them have yet been made that they dare send into the war. They use them for instruction in England to teach men how to fly, but when they go to the Continent to engage in the war they do not use the American machines, and when they take them over there they do not use the American motors. England did not have a motor or a flying machine to speak of. She made an appropriation of £10,000 as a prize to some one who would discover a suitable motor and provide it. Some one did, and that is the motor that they use in English flying machines. We have not yet learned how to make a motor for a flying machine which compares with the machines of England, Germany, or France. It may be that we will develop something of that sort. The Packard Co.—and I am not seeking to advertise the Packard automobile, for that is not the kind of machine I often have occasion to ride in—it is too rich for my blood—the Packard Co., as I understand, have started in to provide a plant for the making of motors to see whether they can develop an air-machine motor. Of course, that has nothing to do with this item, but it may save the expenditure of this money. We have developed an automobile motor which is probably as good as any in the world, at least there are only one or two that are any better than our automobile motors; but when you come to develop a flying-machine motor, very small in extent, light in weight, which will develop a horsepower of 300, you have got to have the very cream and essence of everything. Our motors now on flying machines develop 160 horsepower, but those machines over on the other side which they use in the war develop 300 horsepower, and they wear and last. Even with the machine which we now have, which develops 160 horsepower, it is very difficult with the present motor to always control it. Strange to say, when our flying machines that fly very well up here go down to Mexico and strike a temperature in the sun of 110° to possibly 150°, with the air light, the wheel revolves so fast that it breaks to pieces. I think perhaps we can develop an American motor of 300 horsepower which will be just as good as any in the world. We have always thought when it came to ingenuity, working with machinery, that, if the American mind would turn itself to that, it could not be excelled by any in the world. This is an effort to find out whether that is true, and it is a good effort.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am going to offer a real amendment, and would not the gentleman rather talk upon that?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I want to talk generally. A few moments ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] referred to conditions in Mexico. I have always noticed that it is a good deal easier to indulge——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to make the point of order on my colleague, but we do desire to get through this bill, and if we are going to inject political discussions we will never get through.

Mr. BORLAND. I will confine myself to five minutes, Mr. Chairman, on account of the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, because I do not care to prolong the passage of the bill.

The next few days may determine the question of our relations to Mexico. It is a very serious question, and one upon which our Government has been careful not to act hastily.

When the present Democratic administration came into power, it found a condition of revolution existing in Mexico which had begun under the previous administration. As early as March 14, 1912, President Taft had been obliged to ask Congress for specific authority to place an embargo on shipment of arms to Mexico. A joint resolution was passed in these words:

> That whenever the President shall find that in any American country conditions of domestic violence exist which are promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitation and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

The revolution apparently was successful, and nearly a year after the inauguration of President Wilson, when it seemed that the Mexicans had at length restored their government by the selection of the constitutional President, Francisco Madero, this embargo was removed on February 3, 1914.

Unfortunately, the liberal administration of Madero, which seemed to be actuated by an honest intention to carry out great fundamental reforms and raise the Mexican people to a full share of participation in their own government, was taken advantage of by disorderly and ambitious elements in that country. The assassination of President Madero in cold blood was followed by the attempt to restore a military dictatorship. Revolution broke out again in its most violent form, especially in the northern States of Mexico adjoining our border. On October 9, 1915, President Wilson found it necessary to reimpose the embargo against the shipment of arms, applying it by Executive order against the States of Chihuahua, Sonora, and Lower California. This applied specifically to the territory then overrun by the bandit Villa, which was in a state of anarchy without semblance of civilized government.

Ten days preceding, on October 9, 1915, this Government had recognized the de facto government of Gen. Carranza, under whose leadership the revolutionary forces had apparently been consolidated. The purpose evidently of our administration was to accord to Mexico the full rights of an independent nation and a sister Republic, and to permit her to work out her own national destiny. She was to be given an opportunity to restore civil government and public order by the free action of her own people. It was even apparent that our Government was using every effort to prevent any interference with the restoration of the public order in Mexico by the shipment of arms or the organization of hostile conspiracies from within our border.

Throughout the distressing difficulties of Mexico the sympathies of the great majority of Americans were with the Mexican people, and we were anxious that they should speedily end their troubles without outside interference. To what extent the good offices of the United States prevented interference by European countries and to what extent the shield and protection of the Monroe doctrine secured Mexico in her national rights only the secret archives of the two countries involved will be able to show. During all this time American rights had been sacrificed, American property destroyed, and American citizens outraged and murdered. To a large extent these are the natural results of civil war, and can not be charged in each specific instance to the government of a country where they occur when it is attempted to suppress domestic insurrection.

As has been well said in the note of Secretary of State Lansing, just issued to the Mexican Government:

The Government of the United States, if it had had designs upon the territory of Mexico, would have had no difficulty in finding during this period of revolution and disorder many plausible arguments for intervention in Mexican affairs. Hoping, however, that the people of Mexico would through their own efforts restore peace and establish an orderly government the United States has awaited with patience the consummation of the revolution. When the superiority of the revolutionary faction led by Gen. Carranza became undoubted the United States, after conferring with six others of the American Republics, recognized unconditionally the present de facto government. It hoped and expected that that government would speedily restore order and provide the Mexican people, and others who had given their energy and substances to the development of the great resources of the Republic, opportunity to rebuild in peace and security their shattered fortunes.

The de facto government of Gen. Carranza which was thus recognized on October 9 has had every opportunity accorded it to restore public order and civil government throughout Mexico. During all of this time there has been directed against the administration at Washington the unbridled criticisms and malicious attacks of bitter partisans in our own country, who were seeking to discredit the administration by contending at each step, without rhyme, reason, or consistency, that the American Government was doing exactly the wrong thing. Of course it is impossible to follow or to explain, much less to answer, these criticisms, which were clearly partisan in their nature. No course was pointed out by these self-constituted critics, consistent, practical, or honorable, and scarcely two of them agreed among themselves.

While the Government of the United States has thus been anxious to accord full rights to Mexico and to any real government existing therein, it can not continue to accord such rights to a government which does not govern or to a military ruler who refuses to accept the responsibility of international obligations. While the mere existence of civil war and insurrection in a country, even though it incidentally affects the lives and property of foreigners, is not a cause for intervention, and certainly the mere existence of outlaw bands or the raids of bandits is not to be charged against a government otherwise responsible, active, and vigilant for the protection of its territory; yet when a country reaches that point where it has no government strong enough to exercise the ordinary power and to accept the ordinary responsibilities of national existence, some method of policing such a disorderly territory must exist.

International law fully recognizes the right of a nation affected thereby to protect itself against the absolute collapse of all pretense of civil order. A de facto government can not exist in a country for the sole purpose of collecting revenue by confiscation or otherwise without the power or desire of restoring public order or protecting the international boundaries, and yet expect to be treated with the same consideration and respect as a real national authority.

I pointed out a few weeks ago that the de facto government of Gen. Carranza was growing weaker instead of stronger. Apparently now his only purpose or method of remaining in power is to inflame the minds of the Mexican people against the United States—the country which has suffered most in loss of property and lives from the disorders in Mexico, has been the most patient and sympathetic under such trying circumstances, and has been the one friend of Mexico in its possible complications with other nations. Much of the wealth of Mexico was created by American enterprise; much of its commercial development was due to investment of American capital; much of its political and social life reflected the influence of American ideals. The great bulk of Americans in Mexico have had no part in the revolutionary disturbances which have occurred there, but the loss and suffering have fallen upon them without any fault on their side.

It is not necessary that we should abandon Mexico to anarchy or close it to the legitimate business and natural intercourse which should exist between civilized States. The American Army now in Mexico should not come out, nor should any promises be held out as to the present or future policy of this country to any man or set of men now claiming to exercise political authority in Mexico. Until there is a government in Mexico—not a de facto government conducted by the chief of a fluctuating and well-equipped revolutionary army, but a civil government capable of discharging its national responsibilities—the present policing and protection of northern Mexico should continue. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 7, lines 6 and 7, by striking out "$1,775,000" and inserting "$3,775,000," and by striking out "$1,222,100" and inserting "$3,222,100."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, in line 6, page 7, by striking out "$1,775,000" and inserting "$3,775,000," and in line 7 by striking out "$1,222,100" and inserting "$3,222,100."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs has made what would ordinarily be a very liberal increase for the aviation service. The amount carried last year for the flying machines was $300,000. This year there is an increase to $1,222,100. If the situation was not as it is, I would not suggest any increase. We increased the aviation appropriation for the Navy to three and one-half million dollars. It is much more important that the Army have flying machines than it is that the Navy should have them. No one has yet discovered, though I hope some one will, a flying machine for use in the Navy that can rise from the water with any effect. Take the situation in Mexico now. We have a border line there, I think the gentleman from Texas said this morning, of thirteen hundred miles.

Well, say the whole of Texas has 1,800 miles of border line altogether. For some time we have to keep somebody there protecting that border line. We are trying to do it now with some troops, and evidently contemplate the possibility or the probability of sending the National Guard down to patrol the border, and yet one flying machine could do more good locating an enemy which was liable to come upon the border in the patroling of the border than a whole regiment of men, and it would be no difficult matter to patrol the border with some flying machines with bases at various places, so that they could keep any troops that might be located down there informed as to whether there were any marauding bandits traveling around in the northern part of Mexico with a view of coming across the line into our country.

A flying-machine squadron, I believe, is supposed—I am not sure I have the right term—to keep 12 flying machines in the air. That means that they must have from 18 to 25 machines, because some of them will always be out of repair. It takes a large equipment to handle a squadron of flying machines. I do not mean a large personnel, but a large equipment—trucks, repair shops, and various things of that sort. I am informed, upon what I think is fairly reliable information, that it will cost about $800,000 to provide and maintain for a year a squadron designed to permit the use of 12 flying machines at a time. That is not a very large number to be in active service. We have now, I believe, under recent appropriations purchased in the neighborhood of 20 to 25 machines. We have purchased a dozen very recently. They are having some trouble with the machines down there, which they anticipate they will soon overcome, owing to the rarity of the air in that very hot climate over the sands of Mexico. I think that we ought to provide this arm of the service. It is the most economical expenditure of money that can be made for the Army.

A flying machine, if effective at all, is of more value for what it costs than anything else we could provide in the way of arming the service. We increased appropriations of various kinds quite materially, and, I think, we can well afford to expend nearly at least as much for flying machines for the Army as we have already provided for the Navy, and we provided $3,500,000 for the Navy by the bill which passed the House. I proposed an amendment which will provide $3,222,000 for the Army, and a wiser expenditure of money, in my judgment, can not be made at this time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, the amount carried in the bill for air machines is exactly the estimate asked for by the Secretary of War in a personal hearing before the committee. Probably there was a cut of $10,000, but that was done for the purpose of having an even sum.

The Committee on Appropriations appropriated $600,000 a few months ago for the purpose of buying air machines, which, together with the $1,222,000 appropriated here, makes $1,822,000 for the purchase and upkeep of these air machines for the coming fiscal year. Our information about this matter was, coming directly from the Secretary of War, who had made a special study of this, that this was all that they could use to advantage.

It must be remembered that you have to have the men to fly these machines. There is no use in manufacturing a lot of machines you can not use. We have not the men who have been educated to use them, and therefore to add $2,000,000 to this appropriation to purchase a lot more machines which can not be used seems to me to be unwise. I do not not see that we will be accomplishing anything. I do not see that we would be making any stronger preparation for the country by laying up a lot of these machines which, after all, might be useless a year from now. By that time we might discover a better aviation motor than we have now, and to buy a lot of these machines, which we might have to throw away and not use at all, seems to me to be poor economy; and as the Secretary of War asked for this amount and went into the matter very fully and came to the conclusion that that was all that was needed, I do not think we ought to increase it. Now, this amount of money will buy nearly 100 machines. They cost about $10,000 apiece.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Some time ago the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in a discussion here on the floor of the House, stated, as I remember it, that the motors used in the aeroplanes were made abroad. Where are we now getting our motors?

Mr. HAY. We are getting them here now; I do not think we are getting any from abroad.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is the power of these machines we are getting now?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Illinois has just stated—160 horsepower.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I did not hear the gentleman's statement. I understand these machines are now being made in this country?

Mr. HAY. Yes; and, as the gentleman stated, 160 horsepower is not sufficient for war machines. The power used abroad, he stated, was 300 horsepower, and we are making appropriations here for the purpose of developing a better aviation motor.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. These machines will be strong enough, however, to carry in the rarefied atmosphere of the Southwest, in case they are needed?

Mr. HAY. I understand the machines we have had down there have not done very well.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; but those machines to be constructed now, I assume, will be stronger machines.

Mr. HAY. I assume so. I take it for granted they are constructing the best they can with the information and the material they have and with the engine they have.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Well, but we have the information that is picked up out of the experience that other nations are having. We tried to get that, certainly.

Mr. HAY. No; we have not been able to get from our observers abroad any information whatever as to the manufacture of the air machines abroad.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But we know we need stronger engines than we have.

Mr. HAY. Yes; we need stronger motors, and the reason for applying $50,000 of this appropriation to the purpose of developing a stronger motor is that we may get, if we can, a motor to equal those that are used in the machines abroad.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand that of the eight machines which we sent down to Mexico six were scrapped as practically useless.

Mr. HAY. Of course we have sent others down there since. We have bought some out of this $600,000 appropriation.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But it would seem that we ought to have learned something by this time.

Mr. COX. The statement which the gentleman has made that we have not been able to get any information through our observers abroad is a very interesting one. Why can we not get that information through our attachés?

Mr. HAY. Because the foreign powers guard those secrets.

Mr. COX. They will not let us have the information?

Mr. HAY. They will not let us have the information.

Mr. COX. Then we had better recall our foreign attachés.

Mr. HAY. Oh, we get some information, but they will not let us have the secret of the manufacture of these machines.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman think the time will ever come when they will?

Mr. HAY. After the war is over I suppose they will let us have it.

Mr. FARR. How many air machines have we in the Army?

Mr. HAY. We have had 59 machines in the Army altogether. I do not think there are more than 15 effective machines now.

Mr. FARR. How long can they remain in the air?

Mr. HAY. I am not advised as to that.

Mr. FARR. Before the Naval Committee the statement was made that we had but 9 machines, and that none of them could remain in the air longer than four hours at a time.

Mr. HAY. I do not know about that. I stated that the cost of these machines was $10,000 apiece. I see that the Secretary of War states that they cost $12,500 apiece; that is, the best type of these machines.

Mr. FARR. Of what horsepower?

Mr. HAY. The horsepower is not named, but I presume it is the strongest horsepower we have.

Mr. MANN. One hundred and fifty horsepower.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was speaking of the cost of a squadron. The Secretary of War states that the cost of a squadron, which is composed of 12 aeroplanes, is $233,400. That is the cost of one squadron.

Mr. MANN. I have better information than the Secretary has.

Mr. HAY. I can only state that this information was given by the Secretary of War after he had given a very careful study to this particular subject, and I rather think he knew what he was talking about when he appeared before the committee. That certainly was the impression made upon the committee. So that when we are appropriating $1,222,000, we are appropriating for very nearly six of these squadrons. As I said a moment ago, you have not people who know how to run the air machines, and therefore it seemed to be useless to add $2,000,000 to this appropriation, when we will not be able to use the machines after we get them. In the next year we hope to educate a great many more men. We have provided in the Army reorganization bill for the employment of civilian fliers in the Army, and we hope to get a number of men who will be able to fly these machines. Then it will be time enough to appropriate a larger sum, if at that time it shall be considered necessary to buy more machines.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. It also appeared in evidence before the committee that they had not yet developed a type of motor that was satisfactory.

Mr. HAY. That was stated a moment ago.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. Can the gentleman inform me when the Secretary of War made the statement that the sum of $1,222,100 would answer for the immediate purposes?

Mr. HAY. He made that statement on the 8th day of April, 1916.

Mr. HULBERT. How many aviation schools have we under the jurisdiction of the United States Army at the present time?

Mr. HAY. I think we have one in California, at San Diego, one at Fort Sam Houston, and one, possibly, at some point in Georgia, although I am not certain about that.

Mr. HULBERT. How many students are they able to accommodate within the time required for the period of instruction?

Mr. HAY. They can accommodate all that are provided for, I suppose.

Mr. HULBERT. In other words, do I understand the gentleman correctly that we are able, in the schools that we have, to educate a sufficient number of aviators for the number of machines that we have at the present time?

Mr. HAY. Yes; if they will volunteer for the service. You see, this is a volunteer service. You can not, except in time of war, detail men to go into the aviation section of the Army.

Mr. HULBERT. Unless they are willing to go?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. I have had several cases of men who wished to go into the aviation section, and I have not been able to get the department to accept them.

Mr. HAY. Do you mean civilians?

Mr. HULBERT. I mean men in the service who want to get into the aviation section, and the department were unwilling to take them because they said they did not have the machines with which to supply them. In other words, it has been the absence of machines that has prevented men who were willing from being transferred to the Aviation Service.

Mr. HAY. That is not my information. They have had machines with which they could instruct them. This appropriation will provide amply for all that, and more besides. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is an interesting circumstance that the House of Representatives put flying machines into the Army, in the first place, without any request from the Secretary of War. Of course we are always told we ought to follow the advice of the experts, and that the Secretary of War is the expert. Just think of it, now! Only a few years ago the War Department refused to make an estimate for flying machines in the Army. They wanted the money for something else. It was not considered important enough. This House took a different view. It was this House that put aviation into the Army, without any request from the Secretary of War. I have forgotten who the Secretary of War was at that time. He was a very good gentleman.

Mr. COX. And a Republican.

Mr. MANN. He was a very bright man, as is the present Secretary of War. But the present Secretary of War has not had time to learn all about flying machines. He has not been there long enough. What the Signal Service asked for this year, when they made up their estimates, was nearly $4,000,000. I could give the exact figures, but perhaps that is not advisable. I do not want to indicate how I got them or where I got them. That does not make any difference.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman could have got them in the hearings.

Mr. MANN. I did not. Did the hearings show that that was what they asked for?

Mr. HAY. The hearing on the Army organization bill does that.

Mr. MANN. Very well. The gentleman said that the estimate was what they granted.

Mr. HAY. I said the Secretary of War appeared before the committee and said that this amount of money was what was needed for the aviation section this year.

Mr. MANN. And the Secretary of War also stated that a squadron could be provided or maintained, or both, and I am not sure which the gentleman said, for $233,000. I do not know whether the gentleman said "provided or maintained" or "provided and maintained." You can purchase 12 flying machines for $12,000 apiece. My information is that they have just made that purchase; but that is only the beginning of a squadron. A squadron is designed to be able to keep 12 machines in the air at one time, and it requires the control of 50 or 60 per cent more in machines. That is, to begin with in machines. But when you have the machines you have only commenced the expense. A flying machine wears out quicker than any other machine in the world. The estimate in Europe to-day is that a flying machine in service is replaced during the course of a year four times in every part of it. You must have your motor trucks to handle the machines, you must have your houses to keep them in, you must have your repair shops in which constantly to repair them.

When you purchase the flying machine, to begin with, you have to purchase enough parts to help take care of it, and there are more parts that come with it than constitute one machine. My statement is correct that the estimate in the War Department to-day to provide and maintain a squadron of flying machines will be $800,000, and that allows only $200,000 for the machines. The estimate is that the maintenance and repair and replacing amounts to $600,000 a year for a squadron. I have the latest figures on the subject. Of course they are estimates.

Mr. HAY. I would like to read to the gentleman just what the Secretary said on this subject:

> The intention is to have 2 squadrons of 12 machines with 50 per cent of spare parts, and the machines are estimated at $12,000 each, including the spare parts. Then there is an estimate to be added, in addition, for certain trucks, motorcycles, supply trucks, tank trucks, carrier trucks, machine-shop trucks, making up the entire equipment of an aero squadron, with 12 aeroplanes, and all the attendant and accessory trucks and parts, the total cost of one squadron being $233,400.

Mr. MANN. That is the purchase to begin with.

Mr. HAY. That includes the spare parts.

Mr. MANN. That is the purchase to begin with. That is what they pay for the purchase of the machines.

[The time of Mr. MANN having expired, he was granted five minutes more.]

Mr. MANN. I have only allowed $200,000 for that, but the Secretary says $233,000. The maintenance per year amounts to $800,000.

The gentleman from Virginia says we have nobody to operate flying machines. Well, we have been a little slow in teaching men to fly machines. We have not had the machines to fly, and there is no way on earth that a bird can learn to fly unless it has wings; there is no way that a man can learn to fly until he has the apparatus. We have not had it. We all know, and the gentleman knows, that the condition of the aviation section of the Army has been deplorable. It has all been reorganized, I am informed. We did start out with the theory that it took a man a year or two years' time in which to learn to fly a machine. England is teaching her flyers in three months' time to be able to go to the front and fly any kind of a flying machine.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Down here at Newport News they have a school called the Curtiss Flying School. Has the gentleman investigated that, so as to know how long it takes a man to learn to fly there?

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not think it takes him very long under their system.

Mr. MANN. I have forgotten how long Art Smith, the greatest flier the world ever produced, told me it took him, but it was not long. England teaches her men in three months, because she has the machines. We can not teach them without the machines. There is no trouble about teaching men to fly if you have the machines. There is no trouble in making use of the machines and no doubt about the value that they would be to us along the Mexican border if we had them. It is not such a large amount of money compared with the total appropriations that we make. I hope we can appropriate this additional $2,000,000 for aviation in the Army, where it will be of great use to us during the next fiscal year as well as for the years to follow. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 52 ayes and 60 noes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 77.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. HULBERT: On page 7, line 6, strike out "$3,775,000" and also all of lines 7 to 20, inclusive, and insert "$14,552,900: Provided, however, That not more than $5,000,000 thereof shall be utilized to establish and operate 10 Army aviation schools, in locations to be determined by the Secretary of War, to train aviators from the Regular Army and militia and civilian volunteers as reserves.
> "Not more than $5,000,000 thereof shall be utilized for the organization, equipment, and operation of four aero squadrons, each squadron to consist of 12 aviators, who shall be allowed 3 aeroplanes each; and so much of the balance remaining from this $5,000,000 after providing for the four aviation squadrons shall be, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, devoted to providing aeroplanes and aeronautical equipment for the State National Guards.
>
> "Not more than $2,000,000 thereof shall be utilized for the acquisition and operation of dirigibles and kites or observation balloons.
> "Not more than $2,000,000 thereof shall be utilized for the acquisition or rental of suitable aviation fields and for providing the buildings necessary for permanent aviation schools."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HAY. This provides for the acquisition of land, and it is clearly subject to the point of order.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I submit there is no provision in the amendment respecting the acquisition of land. It does provide for the inauguration of 10 schools, but I believe that the Government has already land on which these schools can be established. It has been stated by the chairman of the committee that we have three schools at the present time. There are certain Army reservations throughout the United States owned by the Government, controlled by the Government, upon which seven additional schools may be established by the committee. I do not think that point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The concluding sentence is that it shall provide for the acquisition of land. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HULBERT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I reoffer the amendment with the last sentence stricken out.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that it provides for the organization of four schools. I do not know under what law they can organize schools. That is legislation, and it is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. HULBERT: On page 7, line 6, strike out "$3,775,000" and also all of lines 7 to 20, inclusive, and insert "$8,000,000: Provided, however, That not more than $5,000,000 thereof shall be utilized for the organization, equipment, and operation of four aero squadrons, each squadron to consist of 12 aviators, who shall be allowed three aeroplanes each, and so much of the balance remaining from this $5,000,000 after providing for the four aviation squadrons shall be, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, devoted to providing aeroplanes and aeronautical equipment for the State National Guards."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this changes existing law. The Army organization bill recently passed provided what the organization of aero squadrons should be, and it proposes to change the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia reserve the point of order for a moment?

Mr. HAY. Yes. If the gentleman does not desire to be heard upon the point of order, I will say to him that I will now take a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. HULBERT. But I desire to be heard upon the point of order.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I had this amendment ready for submission when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who received prior recognition, submitted the amendment which has just passed the House, and I happen to be one of the few Democrats on this side of the House who voted for it. I felt after the amendment offered by him had been read that this proposed amendment, which I have submitted, met the very point urged and contended for by the chairman of the committee, namely, that the chief objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois was that it was a useless and wasteful expenditure of the public funds to provide money for the purchase of aeroplanes when they did not have facilities to educate men to operate them; and I did not anticipate that there would be that objection, at least, to the feature of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], particularly in view of the fact that a majority of this House has decided that we do need the airships, and if, as he contends, we are now faced with a condition where we have the airships and have not the facilities and conveniences to educate the men, then we ought to look the situation squarely in the face and provide now for the schools in order to educate the men to make use of the airships which this House has already voted should be purchased.

Mr. Chairman, when we remember the fact that it was an American who invented the steamship, and yet that it remained for us to adopt a policy of watchful waiting until other nations had demonstrated its practicability in gaining the supremacy of the seas before we brought into this House and enacted only a few weeks ago the shipping bill, looking to the upbuilding and restoration of a merchant marine, which had fallen away until we found ourselves among the lowest of the maritime nations on earth; when we consider that it was an American citizen who invented the submarine, while we have stood silently by and watched and waited for the nations of Europe now in the throes of armed conflict to demonstrate its utility; when we remember that it was an American who invented the airship, and that we are now taking lessons in its development and its demonstration from the nations of the Old World, it seems high time to me that at least as to this last great achievement, given to science, as I have said, by an American, we ought to be the first to appreciate our heritage and take it up in a serious manner and endeavor to demonstrate to the people of the world that we are not ungrateful to our citizens, who sacrifice their time and talent in order that they may place at the disposal of their Government these great products of scientific research. I predict that the aeroplane will in the future be the real means for the defense of our country. Those of you who live in the central and far West need not fear the assaults that may be made upon the Atlantic or the Pacific coast by the battleships, battle cruisers, or other vessels of war of the enemy navies that we may have to meet; and those of you who live far removed from the coast need not fear the destructive effects of the 43-centimeter guns, if they shall ever be landed upon our shores; but if we are locked in armed conflict with our sister Republic on the south, and you do not provide the means to educate the men and equip them in order to protect us against invasion through the air over our border, the people of your communities will live to regret the day when you failed to give them the modern means of defending themselves from an affliction worse than the people of your locality have ever been terrorized with when your country has been ravaged by tornadoes and other similar calamities. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 6, page 7, strike out "$3,775,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,775,000," and in line 7, strike out "$3,222,100" and insert in place thereof "$7,222,100."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter whenever contracts which are not to be performed within 60 days are made on behalf of the Government by the Chief Signal Officer, or by officers of the Signal Corps authorized to make them, and are in excess of $500 in amount, such contracts shall be reduced to writing and signed by the contracting parties. In all other cases contracts shall be entered into under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Chief Signal Officer.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. There have been occasions when we have given permit I believe, in regard to the execution of contracts.

Mr. HAY. That has been done with all the different departments of the War Department, I believe, except the Signal Corps. There may be one other.

Mr. MANN. I did not examine to see whether this was the form of language used in the other cases or not.

Mr. HAY. They are all in the same form.

Mr. MANN. If it is in the same form I have no objection, because I went over the matter very carefully the first time. Of course, this is designed to let them execute a contract below $500 without signing it, as I understand it. It does not change the law as to contracts over $500?

Mr. HAY. No; it does not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase of land in the State of California for aviation school purposes: For the acquisition, by purchase or by condemnation, of a site or sites in the State of California for an aviation school and training grounds of the Signal Corps of the United States Army, not to exceed $300,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. Is this for the purpose of purchasing that land which is in the bay of San Diego, where the aviation school is?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is the need of purchasing it?

Mr. HAY. Why, because they are using it now, and the owners have notified the Government that they will not permit the use of their land for that purpose any longer.

Mr. MANN. We have been using it without any expense—we pay no rental for it?

Mr. HAY. No.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the owners could do with it.

Mr. HAY. They say——

Mr. MANN. I just wondered whether it was pure bluff. There is nothing the owners can do with it; there is no use they can make of it. You could not rent it for a dollar a year, I believe.

Mr. HAY. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. It may be valuable sometime. It is not worthless land; but it is valueless as far as any present use is concerned; but, of course, it is valuable to the Government to have the school there, and if we can not get it any other way we may have to buy it.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois, with his permission, that it is impossible for the Government to put up any permanent structures there now.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman knows we have only some temporary sheds, because we do not own the land and are tenants on sufferance.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. BORLAND. These temporary sheds are utterly inadequate, and if it is intended to have a permanent station there we ought to have the land.

Mr. MANN. I suppose that is true, but I do not know. This aviation school was located at this place because the Government could get the use of the land for nothing.

Mr. HAY. Well, I think——

Mr. MANN (continuing). Well, I had supposed, to be perfectly frank with the gentleman, that the Government owned a great deal of land in the West and Southwest which was just as acceptable and could be used for an aviation school as this little piece of land in the bay of San Diego, which other land the Government now owns and it would not have to buy it and that if it were confronted with the situation where it could no longer get this land for nothing at San Diego, it could go on its own land in New Mexico, Arizona, or some other places, California or elsewhere, and possibly it might be cheaper to take a new field. The Government could move off this piece of land just as easy as a transient can move out of a hotel. There is nothing of much consequence there.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that if there is a controlling reason for having it at San Diego it is on account of the currents of air through the combination of land and water which they need for the instruction of these people who learn to fly, and that is the reason why they want it there.

Mr. MANN. That is merely buncombe.

Mr. HAY. That may be, I do not know.

Mr. MANN. They learn better to fly in England than in America. Nobody would pretend for a moment that the atmospheric conditions anywhere in England are as good as they are in Washington. They are much more stable at San Diego than anywhere else throughout this section of the country, but they could learn to fly anywhere they got a chance.

Mr. HAY. If that is the case, I think the gentleman really ought to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Really I think myself I ought to do so, but I am not going to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF OFFICERS OF THE LINE.

For pay of officers of the line, $10,000,000: Provided, That the act to provide for recognizing the services of certain officers of the Army, Navy, and Public Health Service for their services in connection with the construction of the Panama Canal, to extend to certain of such officers the thanks of Congress, and for other purposes, approved March 4, 1915, be amended by striking out entirely the last proviso in section 5 in so far as the same applies to the officers mentioned in section of said act.

Mr. BORLAND rose.

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that paragraph, unless the gentleman from Missouri is going to.

Mr. BORLAND. I was going to.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DENT. Of course the paragraph is subject to a point of order. There is no question about that.

Mr. MANN. Of course it is.

Mr. DENT. The object of it, however, was simply to correct a construction that has been placed on the Panama Canal act by the War Department. For instance, to state the case in a concrete form, Maj. Gen. Goethals may have been a major general for 10 years, and some young man, some officer who was graduated from West Point one year ahead of Maj. Goethals, may hereafter be appointed a major general, and he would outrank Maj. Gen. Goethals.

Mr. MANN. You would not say "some young man." They do not appoint young men major generals.

Mr. DENT. I mean some cadet who as a young man was graduated from West Point one year ahead of Maj. Gen. Goethals.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says that that is the construction of the War Department.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is not that the exact provision of the law?

Mr. DENT. That was the construction put upon it by the War Department, and I think it is correct, but I do not think that that was the intention of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; that was exactly what was intended. Here was the situation: We intended originally to do something for Col. Goethals and for Dr. Gorgas, in recognition of something they had done in time of peace, which legislative bodies usually do at times for some who have done great things in time of war. Then the rest of the commission desired to be taken care of, or their friends desired that they should be, and they were included. Then the gentlemen from the Army who had been given work at Panama thought they ought to be included. Everybody was given a promotion. But giving special promotions in the Army and the Navy ordinarily is unfair to the men who are jumped over. So this act provided that where promotions were made they should be carried as extra numbers in the grade. That was for the purpose of taking care of those who otherwise would lose promotion. Then it also provided that where a man received a promotion, from colonel to brigadier general, say, jumping over somebody else, the other man so appointed a brigadier general should take priority over the man who jumped over him. In other words, we gave the title and extra pay to a man for a time because he was at Panama, but we did not intend for all time to make him jump over everybody else who ranked him, and I do not think we ought to do so. Now, that was clearly understood when we passed the bill.

Mr. DENT. It may have been so understood by the gentleman from Illinois. It was not so understood by me.

Mr. MANN. It was so understood by everybody who read the bill.

Mr. DENT. I confess I overlooked that feature of it at the time, and I think other gentlemen interested in it overlooked it. But the sole proposition is simply whether or not it is fair for a man to serve as a major general or brigadier general for 10 years and then for some officer who happened to have been graduated a year or two ahead of him to be appointed a major general or a brigadier general and then outrank him.

Mr. MANN. After all, these gentlemen then desired to get the promotion. Every one of them was in favor of the passage of the bill. Now that they have got the promotion they do not feel quite so anxious about getting it. They have already got it. Then they were willing to concede that the men who were ranking them had done good service elsewhere and that the men remaining behind were not expected to be kept behind those who went to Panama. But as soon as they get the promotion, hoggishly they want more. I think the most of them got more than they were entitled to. There was no reason on earth why we should have given all of these people promotions.

But that is not all. I think the distinguished committee which reported that bill have now reported a bill to repeal that section. If they have not reported it, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has introduced a bill repealing it.

Mr. ADAMSON. And the committee have reported it, too.

Mr. MANN. Now they want more promotions.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the able remarks of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He may be correct in all he has said. If so, my recollection is at fault in some particulars. I have sent for the original bill as the House passed it, in order to see who is right. In the first place, the gentleman is mistaken, so far as it comes within my knowledge, in stating that those officers we sought to favor asked for exceptional recognition. I think, first and last, I conversed with every single one of the five distinguished engineers who put through that great enterprise, the Panama Canal. Every one of them—Col. Goethals and all of them—said they did not deserve anything in the way of extra pay or honor, and did not ask anything. There was an effort to reward Col. Goethals alone. Col. Goethals repeatedly said to me that he did not want it done; that if anything was done at all he wanted all the five engineers to share in the honor; that he did not ask it at all, and none of them did.

I introduced a bill extending the thanks of Congress to those gentlemen, which really was the most valuable thing; but after conferring with my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. DENT] I put in the other proposition to promote the five engineers. The War Department worked on that bill and suggested amendments, and it was put in proper shape and passed this House, not with the proviso in it that we are now offering to repeal, but with an entirely contradictory proviso, that this action should not interfere with their promotion in due course. Here is the exact language of the proviso:

Provided, That no officer now belonging to said corps or said department shall be deprived of or prejudiced in his regular promotion.

After we passed that bill with that proviso it went to the other body at the other end of the Capitol, and then I do not know what influences prevailed, or who asked for anything, but 25 or 30 other people—inferior officers in the Army and officers of the Health Service, who were not engineers and had not constructed the canal and were not entitled to the great and distinguished consideration which we were trying to afford to these immortal five engineers—went to the body at the other end of the Capitol, and that body incorporated all these other people and gave them certain promotion, but not the thanks of Congress.

Then following that amendment they put in this proviso that we are trying to repeal that these inferior officers and the officers of the Health Service should not be promoted until the thing had passed around to everybody else. Such proviso is as follows:

And provided further, That the officers advanced to higher grades under this act shall be junior to the officers who now rank them under existing law when these officers have reached the same grade.

But as it connected up with the entire bill which came back here in the throes of dissolution of the last Congress, when there was not a quorum here, and when we did everything that was done for 24 hours by unanimous consent, Brother DENT and I did not have time to study all the intricacies of the situation, and we could not imagine that the body at the other end of the Capitol had done such a foolish thing, and we concurred in that amendment. We made a monumental mistake when we did it. It would have been better to kill the legislation, and wait and offer it now. But the act is now construed to mean, in contradiction to the proviso which we originally put in, that it should not interfere with the promotion of these five engineers, that this proviso put in by the body at the other end of the Capitol means that these engineers can not be promoted until everybody else has had a chance.

We want to repeal that in this bill. That is for the purpose of repealing the proviso put on at the other end of the Capitol. These five engineers ought not to be impeded in orderly promotion. It is true, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that I did introduce a bill to repeal a part of that act, and it is further true that I have reported it to this House. The reason of it is this: As soon as it appeared that the body at the other end of the Capitol had extended the benefits of this act until it made recognition so common that recognition was of no distinction and no value and that the loaves and fishes were all that could be seen in the act extended by a beneficent Government to reward these great engineers for the services they had performed, all the inferior naval and Army officers and all the civilians pitched in and said that they must have recognition as well as the others; and so they pitched in and raided Congress with a lobby to force recognition of other things and other people, and I introduced a bill to repeal that part of the act that was put on by the amendment at the other end of the Capitol. It ought never to have been accepted by the House. The proper thing to do is not to commit a second wrong because we had committed the first wrong. The proper thing to do is to correct the first wrong. I do not think that there is any doubt but that the repeal ought to be made in accordance with the intention of the House of Representatives when it passed the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist on the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama want to be heard?

Mr. DENT. No, Mr. Chairman; I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY OF ENLISTED MEN.

For pay of enlisted men of all grades, including recruits, $23,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 19, after the word "recruits," insert the words "the pay of any enlisted man to be not less than $20 per month."

Mr. HAY. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not offer any amendment to increase the amount provided in this bill for the pay of enlisted men of all grades because we are helpless. We can not consider an amendment to increase the pay of the soldiers, because such an amendment is out of order under our rules. We can not offer an amendment to increase the number of enlisted men in the Army, because that amendment is also out of order, inasmuch as the number is already fixed by law. On page 52 of the hearings you will find where the trouble lies. The estimates of the War Department for pay of enlisted men of all grades during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, is $23,945,995.31. In other words, the gentleman from Virginia has come within a million dollars of appropriating all that the War Department asked for.

Now, how does the misunderstanding arise? Why is it that we have the idea and that we read in the newspapers that we are going to have an Army with a peace strength of 208,000 men? It is because people will not read the law that we passed. Section 2 of the Hay-Chamberlain Act provides that we can not have more than 175,000 enlisted men of the line in our Army except in a time of emergency or war. It is true that without further legislation, in case of war, we can expand our enlisted force to over 225,000 combatants, but we have to enlist and train the recruits when it is too late. Heretofore the number of enlisted men of the line was limited by law to 100,000 men. The Hay-Chamberlain Act raises that limit to 175,000, but requires that the increase be attained in five annual installments. There is the misunderstanding. Unless war is upon us we are not permitted by law to have an Army any greater than 120,000 enlisted men of the line at the outside prior to the 1st of July, 1917, 13 months away. The next year after that we shall add about 15,000 more, and so on, unless we have war or unless the law is changed.

There is the colored gentleman in the woodpile. We talk about an Army of 208,000 enlisted men, peace strength. In five years, if we can enlist them, we shall have that number of enlisted men, but only 175,000 combatants. Quartermasters' employees, hospital attendants, staff departments, unassigned recruits, and so forth, account for the rest. I have tried to get a statement from the War Department as to the legal strength of the Army in 1917, but the matter is still confused, as this letter from Gen. McCain shows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 7, 1916.

Hon. A. P. GARDNER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GARDNER: In response to your letter of the 30th ultimo, in which you request information as to the authorized enlisted strength of the line of the Army on August 1, 1914, and the enlisted strength of the line as it will be after the first and second increments are made under the provisions of the act of June 3, 1916, I beg leave to advise you as follows:

The authorized enlisted strength of the line of the Army on August 1, 1914, was 75,341.

In view of the fact that no conclusion has been reached by the department as to the number of men to be included in each annual increment under the provisions of the act of June 3, 1916, I am unable to furnish you with an accurate estimate of the strength of the line during the fiscal years 1917 and 1918. There is some question as to the proper basis upon which to compute the increases authorized in the recent act. The act of February 2, 1901, provides for a minimum and maximum strength for line organizations, with a provision that the line of the Army, including the Philippine Scouts, shall not exceed 100,000, while the recent act provides that, except in case of emergency, the line, excluding the Philippine Scouts and unassigned recruits, shall not exceed 175,000.

In the former act the unassigned recruits were included in the line. There is some doubt, therefore, as to the exact strength of the line organizations under the provisions of the act of February 2, 1901, whether it is the maximum strength, the 100,000 minus the Philippine Scouts, or the strength as authorized by Executive order prior to the passage of the resolution of March 17.

Should it be determined that the organizations of the line is to be maintained at their statutory minimum strength, and if the strength of the line as authorized by Executive order prior to the passage of the resolution of March 17 is used as a base upon which to estimate the increases provided in the recent act, the strength of the line during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, would be approximately 99,000, and during the fiscal year 1918 that strength would be approximately 125,000. These figures do not include unassigned recruits, heretofore included in the line.

These figures are not to be accepted as a determination by the department as the strength of the line during the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, as that strength has not yet been fixed by the department for either of the years mentioned.

Regretting that I am unable to furnish you with definite information at this time, I am,

Very truly, yours,

H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Everyone admits that at the outside until after July 1, 1917, the Army can not consist of over 120,000 men of the line.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman recollects that the chairman said this morning that $23,000,000 would only provide for 105,000 men?

Mr. GARDNER. That is correct.

Mr. TOWNER. And so that would leave no appropriation for the 15,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. I do not think that the estimate of 120,000 corresponds very closely with the estimate of the War Department.

The department estimates the enlisted combantant strength for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1917, at 106,378 men. The question hinges on the interpretation of the law. (See hearings, p. 11.)

Mr. TOWNER. According to their own statement there is no appropriation for the 15,000 additional men.

Mr. GARDNER. I have just called attention to Gen. McCain's letter.

Mr. TOWNER. But my point is this: That even according to the estimate made by the gentlemen on the other side, 120,000 men, they make no appropriation for the additional 15,000 men.

Mr. GARDNER. That is perfectly true. Now, Mr. Chairman, how did the impression get abroad that we were to have 208,000 enlisted fighting men in the Army just as quickly as we could enlist them? Who is responsible?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER. The way that came about was this: The figures started with 175,000 enlisted men of the line. That is the limit under the Hay-Chamberlain Act. To that they added all of the quartermaster's employees and all of the hospital stewards. To that they add the unassigned recruits, and in some of the tables they added officers. Next they assumed that just because we have voted to increase the Army prior to July 1, 1921, to a maximum peace strength of 175,000 men of the line, that therefore we are justified in speaking of that Army as if it were already in existence.

One word now about the pay of the Army. I discussed the question of the pay of the enlisted men of the Army, and I offered amendments to increase it when the Hay-Chamberlain Act was under consideration in this House. I desire at this time to express my belief as to the cause of the reluctance of American boys to enlist in the Army. It is not altogether a question of pay. By the way, the Canadian Army is paying $33 a month to each one of its soldiers who enlist in the overseas force. In addition the Government allows $20 to the wife who stays behind. Just think of the difference between the situation of the Canadian soldier with a wife getting a separate allowance, altogether the family getting $53 a month, and the situation of a militiaman called out for service on the border or in Mexico.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has that been his pay only since the European war began?

Mr. GARDNER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What was the pay of the soldier prior to that?

Mr. GARDNER. Fifty cents a day for a private, the same as ours. I do not know the peace arrangements of the Australian Army, but a private in the Australian Army to-day is paid $1.50 a day and his wife gets a daily allowance less than the Canadian allowance, I think 35 cents a day, which counts up to a little over $10 a month. The Canadian Army is what I know most about, and I do not know anything about their pension system. Young fellows going into the Army do not think very much about the pension system. A young man going into the Canadian Army to-day says, "How much will I get and how much will my wife get?"

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe under the Canadian law, since the war began, they also have a pensionable status, at all events for widows.

Mr. GARDNER. And I think for disability and long service, as well. There are four reasons why men do not enlist, in my opinion. In the first place, there is the limited opportunity which enlistment affords for promotion to commissioned rank. We have very much improved in that respect, but even if we go to the utmost that I or anyone else would recommend, we shall still be confronted by the fact that any man to become an officer must be made to pass a pretty stiff examination.

Only a small proportion of men in the Army can do so. I believe that we can add to the enlisted man's horizon, but it will be a relatively small number of additional recruits which we shall get. That is reason No. 1. Reason No. 2 is because we entirely underpay our enlisted men. The evidence of a number of the younger officers who testified before the committee and the views of the recruiting officers convince me that enlistments will undoubtedly increase if we increase the pay. The third reason for the scarcity of recruits arises from the fact that a young man is reluctant to mortgage his future for a long period of years. The Hay-Chamberlain Act marks an advance in dealing with that situation; but, nevertheless, if we are going to have a reserve army, we must require men to obligate themselves to serve in case of war after their period of active service is over. In the Hay-Chamberlain Act we have gone as far as seems wise in reducing the number of months of active service which a man must spend with the colors before he goes to the reserves. We can not go very much further in that direction. We now come to reason No. 4. This reason was touched upon by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] when the Hay-Chamberlain Act was under discussion in this House.

I believe there is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman says. Still I do not yet see what the remedy is. I believe it to be the fact that the average young man is not willing to obligate himself to obey some one else's orders for 24 hours every day for one or more years. The average man dislikes the obligation to salute his superior officer, because that salute is an overt indication that he has yielded his will to some one else. That is a fundamental feeling. I do not know how we are going to change it. The young man says, "I do not want to salute the officer," and what he really means is that he does not want to show by any gesture of his that he has subjected his will to that of any one else on earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, a primary difficulty, it seems to me, with Members of the House is that they lack adequate information regarding the true condition of matters regarding the Army. We have the estimate of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] and the estimate of the chairman of the committee of the number of men to be appropriated for, and they differ by thousands. We have sent to us an estimate by the War Department for the pay of 105,000 men, and yet the chairman of the committee admits on the floor of the House that there ought to be provision for the pay of 120,000. In my judgment there ought to be a provision for the pay of a great many more men than that, but just exactly how many more than that estimate it is impossible for us to determine. There ought not to be at this time this condition of secrecy, not to say misrepresentation. This House ought to know, in order to be able to do its duty, what are the exact facts. This House is ready now, as it always has been, to meet any demand that may be made by the administration for preparedness for this probable Mexican war or any other war, but we do want to know something about the real condition of affairs. This administration has never come to the House and asked it for anything to prepare for the defense of the Nation or to meet any requirement in that regard that has not been given promptly and unanimously, and I believe, judging from the sentiment at least on this side of the House, that there will be no demand made by this administration on this Congress for anything in that nature that will not be immediately granted and gladly given in support of this country's honor and what may be necessary for its protection.

Mr. Chairman, the difficulty is that this administration seems to be playing fast and loose with this question. They want the people of the country to believe that they are for preparedness, and yet, when they come before Congress with their appropriations, in order to make an appearance of small appropriations and economy, they do not ask for a sufficient amount to provide for the real and unquestionably necessary amounts for the support of the Army that the House has already provided for. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the country ought to know this, and while the newspapers of the country are heaping criticisms upon the Congress they ought to be told, they ought to know, and the people of the country ought to know, that this Congress is ready to meet any demand that the administration may make upon it or to take any action that may be necessary when they call upon us to do so. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service of enlisted men of the line, $2,300,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Virginia, would accept the amendment I offered a little while ago providing that the pay of enlisted men should not be less than $20 per month, although it was subject to the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I will say to the gentleman that if the amendment was offered that way it would cut down the pay of one-fourth of the enlisted men in the Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh——

Mr. HAY. You can not work out a pay system by offering an amendment in that way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman, so long as he is on his feet, just how the pay is adjusted? Is it by statute or in the discretion of the department?

Mr. HAY. It is by statute—by law.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the pay of $15 for the enlisted men fixed by act of Congress?

Mr. HAY. Yes, sir; the pay of privates is $15; the pay of corporals is so much more; the pay of sergeants is so much more; the pay of a first sergeant, a quartermaster sergeant, and so forth. There are various grades, but they are all enlisted men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was referring to the privates, and I am endeavoring to increase, certainly not to lower, the pay of the private soldier, the man who, in my judgment, despite the fact that I believe in discipline and in military skill and generalship, must be depended upon in the last analysis for American victories.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not hear the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My amendment provided that as to this lump sum of $23,000,000 appropriated for the pay of enlisted men no enlisted man should receive out of it less than $20 a month.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not understand, then, how that could reduce the pay of the enlisted man.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Neither do I. The gentleman from Virginia works that out.

Mr. HAY. I will be compelled to make the point of order. I do not think, in the first place, that you will get any more men under it; and, in the second place, we are just now putting in 100,000 men at the same pay the Regular Army gets. I do not know how long they are going to be down there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman whether the $23,000,000 herein appropriated in lump sum will be sufficient to cover the pay of all regular private soldiers as well as those of the National Guard now being drafted into the service?

Mr. HAY. Oh, no; it only covers the pay of the enlisted men of the Regular Army.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Although the President has drafted the National Guard for Federal service?

Mr. HAY. He has not drafted them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under the Military Establishment bill passed the other day he has the power apparently, although the question has been raised as to whether Congress is to be consulted.

Mr. HAY. Not at all. He would not have the power to draft the National Guard without the authority of Congress any more than he would have the right to call out volunteers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman hold that the President would have to come to Congress for authority to draft the National Guard?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And he has not done so?

Mr. HAY. He has not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the National Guard is being called into service.

Mr. HAY. It is being called into service.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. By the governors of the various States?

Mr. HAY. No; called into the service by the President under the Constitution which provides that the President shall call out the militia for certain purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And they are being called into camps in the various States?

Mr. HAY. And they must be paid by the United States Government while in the service of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At the same rate that the regular soldiers are paid?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then so far as legislation is concerned they will become Regular soldiers of the United States?

Mr. HAY. So far as the pay is concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is their pay provided for in this $23,000,000?

Mr. HAY. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There must be another appropriation?

Mr. HAY. There is another appropriation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the National Guardsman if drafted will have the status of a Regular soldier of the United States?

Mr. HAY. The pay provided for the National Guard is in time of peace.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman any idea of the cost of the National Guard as it is proposed to draft them now?

Mr. HAY. The gentleman means "called into service now."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it 100,000 men, roughly estimated?

Mr. HAY. I suppose 85,000 of them would be enlisted men, and it would take about eighteen or nineteen million dollars to pay them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be somewhat less than the appropriation made here.

Mr. HAY. About $5,000,000 less.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What is this item, "For the pay of enlisted men of all grades, National Guard, $7,750,000"?

Mr. HAY. That is when they are not in the service of the United States, which is provided for in the bill we just passed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. While the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] holds the view that an increase of pay for enlisted men would not increase enlistments, and while the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] has also indicated that low pay may not be the principal cause for the failure of enlistments up to the present time, I am of the opinion that an increase of the pay of the men from $15 to $20 a month, or even more, would be an actuating cause for a greater number of enlistments.

Over in my State of Pennsylvania the National Guard mounts up to more than 10,000 men. They are now preparing themselves for service under the call of the President for the borderland of Mexico. They are wondering whether they are to be called into Mexico, and that question, I suppose, will be determined later. These men are volunteers up to the time of their being drafted for service in the Regular Army of the United States. They come from the farms, the stores, the workshops, and the factories. They are men of peace in times of peace. They are not Regular soldiers, though on an emergency call they are willing to be. Fifteen dollars a month is a ridiculous compensation for men of this type, and when it comes to the wife and children left behind, the thought of 50 cents a day in these times of the high cost of living is enough to appall any man who yields up his home for the defense of his country. It is a mighty poor inducement on the part of the Government of the United States to men who are asked to go out enthusiastically under the banner of patriotism for an indefinite period with no ample provision for the family.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think that in organizing an army we can compete with the labor market in time of peace and prosperity? Does he think we can offer wages that will attract men solely on the score of wages? Is there any army in the world that has ever been organized on that basis?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Missouri mean to be understood as objecting to the raising of the pay of a man a few cents a day, when he is offering his life for his country and his wife and children are dependent on his earnings for their food and clothing?

Mr. BORLAND. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman asked me a question, and in Jersey fashion I am asking him one.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman think we can compete with private employers in the wages that we pay for an army in time of peace?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to know if the gentleman would be satisfied to enlist, and leave his wife and children with the assurance that they would get what he could give them out of 50 cents a day, while he was down in Mexico risking his life and perhaps losing it for the sake of his country?

Mr. BORLAND. I am satisfied that both the gentleman and I would enlist, without regard to the pay, if our services were needed in the defense of our country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but you are calling for volunteers whom you propose to draft into the service of the United States, to send them into a foreign country, to live on cactus bushes and sand hills for an indefinite period. Many of them are getting $50 a month or $100 a month at home, and you are expecting to require them to leave their wives and children under these circumstances, to go away and fight, with the comforting assurance that the rent can be paid and that provisions and clothes for the baby can be bought for 50 cents a day. These young men are giving up something.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My understanding is that the pay of the soldiers was raised a certain amount, either directly or indirectly, by allowances or otherwise, during President Roosevelt's administration. My understanding is also that that did stimulate enlistments. I should think it would.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope that statement is true. I have no direct knowledge of the fact.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think their pay ought to be further increased.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My interest in the matter arises from the fact that I know many of these young men who are going into the service.

Ten thousand of them are ready to go from our State, and they are going bravely and in compliance with their obligations, and they will fight as gallantly as the Regular soldiers or as the militia of any other State drafted into the regular service, which is to their credit and to the glory of the flag. But they can not avoid a thought of their other responsibilities. The question is being considered by others. The department stores and the great merchants and manufacturers of my city are now promising that they will continue these young men upon their pay rolls for the sake of the Government. Of course, the Government gives them protection. That is the answer that may be expected to that. But why should not the Government assume a little responsibility in caring for the wives and children of these men? Their pay is mighty small when you look at the total amount appropriated for pay of officers and men. I do not say this invidiously, because I am a friend of the officers and believe in discipline. I do not believe a man in the service should disobey his officer or hold him in contempt, but when we look at these figures and observe that of the total amount appropriated more than one-third and nearly one-half goes to the officers, whose wives and children are thus provided for, and that the private soldiers who are to lay down their lives are to receive 50 cents a day, with no special assurance that even their wives and children will be taken care of, I think I am justified in offering this suggestion that the pay of these men who are going to make this great sacrifice should be increased from $15 a month, or 50 cents a day, to at least $20 a month. My distinguished friend, the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], and my friend from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] may be able to stand for this sort of pay, but I can not. I can at least make my proposition and my protest against the point of order. These men ought to be paid. They are going in time of peace down to our southern border to remain, no one knows how long. They are to leave their jobs behind, and some of their families perhaps may ultimately fall to the care of the community. Why, in my city just now the mayor is calling employers together to find out if some assurance can not be given by way of a guaranty fund that if these boys go forward they need not go with the fear that those whom they leave behind will be left destitute.

I am for the protection of the men who protect what I represent here, and in this instance they are the private soldiers of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as a preliminary statement of what I am going to say, I will state that I have very coolly and deliberately written what I am going to say to the House within the last 20 minutes on this subject discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I believe to-day it is the most serious condition confronting the American people, and yet very little thought of the causes and the effect of this situation has been given by Congress other than by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, my judgment is that the people of this country have never been in the enthusiastic frame of mind as to preparedness that exists to-day. It is dangerous to the political life of any man to point to the day when the taxgatherer will call around.

In all that has been said about preparedness most of the oratory has been devoted to the officers and their salaries, allowances, rank, and promotion, and practically no thought has been devoted to the most deplorable condition confronting the American people as to actual preparedness.

Permit me to call attention in plain language to this condition.

The American Army is in bad repute with the fathers and mothers of this country. Every atom of influence they can muster to prevent their sons from enlisting in the Army and Navy is exerted. Fathers and mothers very reluctantly give their consent for their boy to enlist, although he is engaged in sowing an extensive crop of wild oats, and parental influence and control has been lost over him. Why is it that farmer boys and town boys refuse to take a turn at military service? As an ex-private in the volunteer service of my country, let me give you my candid opinion why our boys shun military service in the Regular Army:

First. The officers have a European idea rather than an American conception of the spirit and pride of the American boy. Our officers, as a rule, believe that it is absolutely inimical to military discipline to show as much interest in the comfort and surroundings of post or camp life of the common soldier as they exhibit for their horse. To speak for any purpose to the private except to give him an order is conduct most reprehensible. An exhibition of any personal interest in a homesick or discontented boy would be conduct "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman." These fool notions must be condemned by the older heads among our officers, and more human interest exerted in the private soldier and his Army life made not a life of humiliation, but a life in which he can feel just pride.

To-day the private soldier in the uniform of his country is an unwelcome guest at first-class restaurants. They are told by many when they desire to order a meal that the simple dish they may desire served is "just out." They leave the place humiliated as they look around and see many whose life they are sworn to defend enjoying the very dish they had been refused. The places of amusement have just sold the "last seat" when the American soldier in uniform seeks admission, and so on down the line.

Thus it is that short service in the Army creates in the breast of the proud American boy a desire to flee from such environments. After his discharge he is continually urging his neighbor boys to beware of the standing army.

Mr. Chairman, the other day I accidentally ran into the first polo game I ever saw. The Army officers were playing some team of millionaires down in Potomac Park. There, with the horses and grooms, were several private soldiers in the uniform of their country exposed to the gaze of a thousand citizens running over the ground gathering up turf that had been torn up by these ponies in their mad chase after a wooden ball and packing it back in the hole their hoofs had made.

The use of the private soldier for menial service of this character ought to be an offense that would subject these officers to court-martial and dismissal from the Army.

This Congress and the country must sooner or later discover that we can not and will not trust the defense of this country, so far as our Regular Army is concerned, to the professional soldier or the boy who has no ambition and can find nothing to do but to become a soldier. We must encourage by proper treatment and wholesome environments the real young manhood of this country to feel that the uniform of the private soldier is an introduction to the world at large that its wearer is a young man of character, a gentleman, a patriotic and courageous citizen, who is not only willing to die for his country's honor but who would die, if needs be, with a smile upon his face. [Applause.]

Let me say that this exalted and princely pinnacle upon which we have perched the Regular Army officer has made asses out of a few, and the larger portion of them are inclined to strut standing still.

Let us who have our country's defense at heart devote a little of our time in the future to the welfare of the private. Let us eliminate the causes for the disgraceful number of desertions from our Regular Army. Let us look upon our officers as every-day human beings. Honor them in the future as we have in the past for deeds of courage and valor; but, for the sake of the future of our Army, let them understand that in democratic America the Army officer is a real man and not an aristocratic demigod. [Applause.]

That is what I think is the sole cause for the slump and inability of this country to enlist young men in the service of the Regular Army, and until the system is changed, until we depart from the treatment accorded the American soldier to-day in the American Army, I say to you as an experienced man who has had service in the Army, that you will never enlist 50,000 young men in any 12 months in this Nation's history except when this country is imperiled by war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pay of enlisted men of all grades, National Guard, $7,750,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I have been very much impressed by what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] has said on the subject of enlistments in the Army. There is a great rush of men to get into the Army as officers, but a great rush away from the Army when it comes to enlisting men to carry guns on their shoulders. There is a reason for this. It has no relation to the pay in my judgment, nor to the patriotism of our people.

It is a mistake to say that $15, the lowest pay of a private soldier, is all that enlisted men receive. These men get a longevity increase, they are retired after they have served a certain length of time, and noncommissioned officers in some instances received very handsome pay. I am informed that there is a case of a sergeant major who gets $125 a month. However, we must not look entirely at the money paid these men. We must consider what else they get. These men are kept, they are found, they are clothed, fed, and housed. They have medical attention and hospital facilities and are looked after in every way. We must not lose sight of the fact that when these men receive an injury or are disabled in the service they will draw a pension from the Government.

I venture to say that the remuneration of the enlisted man in the American Army, on the average, compares in a fair way with the condition of men in industry. I would ask that those who are impatient about what we do for our enlisted men consider that. I would ask the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] what is the average amount paid the workingman in that State—the man that lives at home, that has his family to support? What is the average reward of labor; what does the common laborer get, on an average, in that State?

Mr. KREIDER. Does the gentleman desire an answer?

Mr. BUTLER. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I venture to suggest that an inquiry will show that the common laborer, on the average, does not receive a greater reward than the man who serves as an enlisted man in the Army of the United States.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? They get $1.75 a day, for I have paid them.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. One dollar and seventy-five cents a day for a man with which to clothe himself and feed himself, to pay his hospital bills, his house rent, and everything a man has to pay. I want to say to you, sir, that that is nothing like 50 cents a day with all expenses paid.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman that we are not in the habit of starving people in the State of Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the real trouble has been pointed out by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. We are trying to import European customs into America. I have some first-hand information upon this subject. I have been a private soldier in the American Army and I have marched up and down on guard duty upon the picket post. I have seen the supercilious officer glittering in gold lace, with his sword dangling at his side, strut by, and I have seen him look upon me with scorn and with disgust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I have not the time to dwell upon this subject, but I want to say to you that in my judgment, and as my deliberate conviction, the most undemocratic institutions in all America are the American Army and the American Navy. I want to say that I believe that the spirit of caste which prevails in our Army and Navy is hostile to American institutions and that it is not worthy of a great democracy. I will not dwell on that, but want to pass to what I think is the remedy.

We have at West Point and at Annapolis very expensive institutions. In my judgment they are worse than useless, for we are training away from democracy in the Army and Navy at the very source from which it should flow and be made pure. There is inculcated into those young men when they come from those academies ideas that are not American. They are inspired with the idea that they are better than common men; that they are not of the common clay of the great body of the American people; that they are something superior, to be obeyed, to be saluted, to be accorded unusual courtesies. Why, gentlemen, as you know, the spirit of military circles is to despise the American Congress, sitting here as the representatives of the American people! Not only that, when these young cadets get their commissions there goes with them that same spirit. There are some splendid exceptions to this rule, and I glory in those exceptions. I glory in men who though bred in aristocratic environment are big enough of soul to realize that all men are but common clay. The spirit in the Army is bad. It is one in which the officer is one order of creature and the man is of an entirely different order. This spirit is obnoxious to our proud boys, sons of free American sovereigns, and this is why they will not make common soldiers of themselves.

In the Army the tendency is inevitable for an enlisted man to come to a certain standard, to be content upon a certain plane. That plane is hateful to the sons of the people of this great democracy. Are you gentlemen willing to have your sons put guns on their shoulders in time of peace and enlist in the ranks where supercilious officers will look upon them as serfs, as common, unworthy objects? Not at all. None of you would be willing to have your sons do that.

This same spirit of military caste has been translated into the laws which this body has passed for the government and control of our Army. Many of us, perhaps, are not familiar with the Articles of War. I happen to have made it my business to read those Articles of War; I had to read them. Do you know that if an enlisted man, no matter what the provocation, no matter how great the insult, nor how grievous the wrong, should dare to raise his hand, even his naked hand, against a commissioned officer, he is subject to the penalty of death under the Articles of War passed by the American Congress?

But if the commissioned officer should strike the humble private, should without cause ring his sword over his neck and wound him, what will be done with him? Not any death punishment by any means. He may be punished, and he may not; and I venture to say that if you will examine the records of the Army you will find that the instances in which any very serious punishment has been visited upon officers for wrongs upon enlisted men are very few indeed, yet we, sitting here as Representatives of the people, have passed those laws, and we have perpetuated and contributed our part to the spirit of militarism.

Oh, it is not a question of the money the enlisted man gets out of it; it is the question of a man being treated like a man. The problem of increasing enlistments is the question of doing something to democratize the American Army; it is the question of putting officer and man upon a basis of equality in their social life. I want to say that we will not be able to do much in the way of enlisting men into the American Army to serve in time of peace until we do something to eradicate the outrageous caste spirit that pervades there. That is my opinion, and I trust we may find some way to do it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 24, after the figures "$7,750,000" insert:
"Provided, That all officers and enlisted men of the National Guard who are Government employees and who respond to the call of the President for service shall at the expiration of the military service to which they are called be restored without loss of rank to the positions occupied by them at the time of the call."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order for a few moments?

Mr. HAY. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I realize that this amendment may be subject to the point of order, and that it is probably useless to ask the chairman of the committee to permanently withhold his objection. It is needless for me to endeavor to explain the purpose of the amendment, for by its wording it is self-explanatory. I offer it in the interest of the men who serve their Government and for the benefit of the Government thus served. It is apparent to me that however much we may differ on some things, we are all united in admitting that it is difficult—yea, almost impossible—to enlist men in the service of their country. This is not due to lack of patriotism, it can not be traced to a waning of the virility of our people, nor is it based on fear and danger. To me the explanation lies in the fact that men who may be the sole support of their mothers or their wives hesitate to enlist in the National Guard or enlist in the Army, knowing that their positions from which they derive the sole support for their families will be taken from them while they are serving their flag. For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, feeling that when a man has patriotism and loyalty enough to offer his life for his country, his country should have magnanimity and generosity enough to keep open for him the position he vacated to defend the flag, and I sincerely hope that my friend from Virginia will not make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice in the press that employees, persons holding public positions, who belong to the National Guard who are going into the service, that some arrangements are being made or attempted to be made in order to pay them part of their salaries of the several positions they hold. Does the chairman of the committee have any information on that subject?

Mr. HAY. I have not; no, sir.

Mr. CULLOP. I observed this in the public press in the last day or two; and, Mr. Chairman, if such an attempt is made, it is manifestly unfair to the other young men who, from the private walks of life, who have not had public preference by holding public office, are called upon to enlist in the defense of their country. Such a policy would be injurious, in my opinion, to the good of the service and would have the effect of preventing enlistment from the class of men that the Army will want in the future, men from the civil walks of life.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Is it not true that there is a strong sentiment all through the country in favor of private employers making such arrangements with their employees who are going to the front?

Mr. CULLOP. There may be some sentiment of that kind, but the gentleman will find it will not be done. I insist for one that a private individual who enlists in his country's cause is entitled to just as much consideration at the hands of this Government as some man who has been fed at the public crib for years and years. He is entitled to as much pay for his military service as the man who has a public office and goes into the service.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. Is there any law under which that could be done? As I understand the law, there is nothing but a leave of absence for so many days that can be granted to any employee of the Government, but there is no law under which any part of the pay can be paid.

Mr. CULLOP. They may come under the blanket leave of absence; and if so, that blanket ought to be pulled away and folded up and laid away for a while, because a public officer who enlists in the Army or who is a member of the National Guard is entitled to no more consideration for his military services than the man who goes from the farm, the factory, the mine, or the counting room, and there is no reason, in my judgment, why he should have two salaries for the service. I prefer that we make the pay not only of a man who goes out of a public office but the man who goes from the private walks of life the same as the other and make no distinction whatever among those who enlist. If there is, I am quite sure it will cause serious complaint and be the source of great dissatisfaction. It will do incalculable harm.

I do believe where men surrender official employment and go into the service in response to their country's call, such places should be held for them, so that when they return these places will be open for them, and they can then, if they desire, resume their official positions. This would be proper and right, and I am strongly in favor of it. I hope this privilege will be granted them as a recognition of their loyalty and patriotism.

In my judgment the compensation is too low, and it ought to be higher than it is; but certainly a public officer should not receive additional pay for service that a private individual can not get. I wanted to know from the chairman of the committee, so that it might go into the RECORD, whether this matter was contemplated or not or whether there was any law by which it could be done. If these men holding public positions go into the service of the country, other persons must perform their public duties, and the people ought not to be required to pay twice for the same service. Therefore it seems to me that it would be a discrimination, and one that would prove very injurious to the public, if this plan was to be followed which is now proposed in the columns of the public press.

Let all be treated alike and the public service will profit, and the men in the service will be better satisfied. All who enlist are to be commended for their patriotism, their love of country, and their devotion to the cause of the Union. They demonstrate their courage by showing their willingness to defend the country in the hour of its peril.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I am astonished that there is any such law as that referred to by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], under which any part of the pay of a Government employee can be given to him while he is absent on military service. Any such law as that should be opposed. A man should not draw two salaries; but I would be very glad to vote for an amendment that would allow the man who offers a higher service to the Government than he is now rendering and who goes to the front as a soldier the protection of his place as a Government employee and the right to return to it when the campaign is over. [Applause.] The Government is a different employer than any other. It represents the entire judgment, will, and feeling and sense of justice of the whole American people. There is not a patriotic citizen in the United States who has a man in his employ, where that man enlists in the National Guard and goes to the front, or in the Regular Army, for that matter, who is not willing to say that he will restore the man to his work after he comes back from the war. And the Government should be an expression of the will of the best and most patriotic citizen.

I have listened with regret to the two attacks that were made upon the officers of the Regular Army. We must know that we can not expect an officer, or even a foreman of a section gang or a man in charge of any class of work, to be hail fellow well met with those under his direction. If he does, he will have no control at all over them before he gets through. There is no man on earth who respects a private soldier more—I say it advisedly—there is not a man in all the military service in the world who has more respect for the enlisted man than the American officer. He can not associate with him socially, he can not be on terms of easy intimacy with him, but down in his heart and in his soul he loves him if the soldier is at all willing to do his part.

And when you get among the men who are serving in the Regular Army you will find them saying that such and such an officer, and pretty nearly every one of them, "is a fine man." When you hear them saying that the officer deserves it. They know accurately the reputation of every officer in the Army; and we must remember that the officer is more sensitive of that reputation among those private soldiers than he is of any reputation that he might have even in this House, because they make whatever success he has, and he helps to make the success that they may have.

I saw in the paper this morning a statement that the Regular Army is at 96,000 men. It was something more than 102,000, I believe, before we passed the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. GARDNER. If the gentleman will allow me, I believe the discrepancy in figures arises from the fact that the 102,000 included the Hospital Corps and the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman please tell us how it stands now?

Mr. GARDNER. There are between 92,000 and 93,000 enlisted men of the line.

Mr. TAGGART. We have not got quite as many men as we had a couple of months ago, have we?

Mr. GARDNER. I think we have about 2,000 more.

Mr. TAGGART. I am not going to say anything about the one man who enlisted in Boston. He was a stranger, and they took him in. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER. Disregarding that unfortunate gentleman, I think we have increased enlistments by about 2,000 men. The chairman of the committee can tell us about that. I think the confusion of figures in the gentleman's mind comes from the fact that the Hospital Corps and the Quartermaster's Corps are now excluded from the figures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. I should like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAGGART. Now, there is a plain, easy, old-fashioned explanation for the disinclination of the American young man to enlist in the Regular Army at this time. Times are too good, and you can not get men at 50 cents a day. That is what is the matter, especially in the spring or in the summer. Four or five years ago, especially when the snow began to fly, they had to reject four or five fit men for every one they accepted. They would have four or five good applications where they needed only one man. But now, even in Boston, times are so good that only one man was enlisted in seven days in the shadow of Bunker Hill Monument. [Laughter.] And it is a presumption of law that he was sober.

Mr. CLINE. I think the gentleman does Boston and the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire an injustice, because while they enlisted only 12 men in the month of April, 1915, they enlisted 42 men from all that territory in the month of April, 1916.

Mr. TAGGART. It is not a want of patriotism there. They are just as patriotic as they are in Kansas City, and I think they ran a week in Kansas City and got only 11 men. It is not a lack of patriotism. A man who can get work at $2 or $3 a day under this Democratic administration [applause on the Democratic side] will not enlist. When you read the Republican platform you will discover the secret by the very absence of the old, familiar language. They do not promise prosperity, because it is already here. We have got it. They are just as silent on that as they are on the subject of pensions, which they ignored for the first time in 48 years. We can not expect the boy to give up home for any hard service for 50 cents a day, and in contradistinction to that fact we see right here in Washington that hundreds of men offer themselves as soldiers in the National Guard. It is popular, there is no difficulty in filling up the regiments, and it is a matter of pride to me to say that there are 1,000 men in the second district of Kansas under arms ready to march. If there is any district besides the second district of Kansas that has 1,000 men under arms ready to go, I would be very glad to have the name of the district put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago I made a point of order on an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. When I made the point of order I did not sufficiently understand the proposition carried, and I desire to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 9, line 24, and offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

The clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 9, line 24, after the figures "$7,750,000," by inserting the following:

"Provided, That all officers and enlisted men of the National Guard who are Government employees and who respond to the call of the President for service shall at the expiration of the military service to which they are called be restored to the position occupied by them at the time of the call."

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. This is not confined to men in the executive offices in the District of Columbia, but it extends to service throughout the United States to all men in Government employ wherever they may be found.

Mr. HICKS. Yes. The idea I had in offering it was to facilitate the enlistment in the National Guard. It is a change of service. A man enlisting in the civil government becomes an enlisted man in the military arm.

Mr. BORLAND. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment. I think it is a splendid thing and it ought to be done, and it ought to be a model for other employers to do the same thing.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I would like to ask the gentleman what effect this will have where a man is disabled in the service. Would the Government be compelled to take him back into a position he was not qualified to fill?

Mr. HICKS. I should imagine that he would be subject to the same rules that any other employee would be subject to.

Mr. GALLAGHER. But this directs that he must be taken back into his former position regardless of his ability to fill the position.

Mr. CLINE. It is an elective opportunity, he can return if he wants to.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. GALLAGHER. I take it that under that what I say is correct, that no matter what was the physical condition of the man he is obliged to be taken back.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

CORPS OF ENGINEERS.

Pay of enlisted men, $600,000.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I meant no discourtesy to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] when I declined to be interrupted. I wished to pursue another line of thought. I now want to give him a show for his white alley and am willing to be interrupted.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman define what he means by white alley?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to make a point of order, but we must be getting along with this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Speaking to the point of order, I wish to demonstrate that the pay in the Army is better than the laborer's pay in private life of $1.75 a day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia make the point of order?

Mr. HAY. No; I do not.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the laboring man in his State can make $1.75 a day. I do not think for a moment that wages in Pennsylvania are not as good as they are anywhere else, for in these glorious days of munition making, getting ready for killing men, I do not doubt but that wages are rather better there on an average than over the country at large.

I will concede that a laborer's wages in Pennsylvania are $1.75 a day; that a man always in work and always in health can make, after knocking out Sunday, $43.75 a month. That is the wage a man can make as a laborer when he is always well and always has a job. Now, we know that there must be figured out from 10 to 20 per cent of a man's life when he is not able to work, and we also know that it is unfortunately too true that the $1.75 man is out of work, on the whole, somewhere near 25 per cent of the time. But these points I do not wish to discuss.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In a moment. Now, with this $43.75 a month for the laboring man we will first lay aside the $15 that he would get as the minimum pay in the Army. That is the minimum pay. The average pay for the private in the Army is about $20 a month, and in addition to that he is kept and found, and so forth, as I said. In addition to that, we have the noncommissioned officer, and we have those who get bonuses for longevity in service, and other things of that kind, so that a man may get very good wages in the Army. He may get as much as $125 a month as a sergeant major, but we will take him at his lowest pay, and we will take every intendment in favor of the $1.75 a day man. From the $43.75 we take off the $15 that he would get in money if he served in the Army. We then take off $15 a month for house rent, $3 a month for clothes, and $1 for drugs and doctor bills, and so forth, for himself and his family, and 5 cents a day for tobacco. We allow nothing for street car fare or for pleasure of any kind or description, or anything else that a man has got to have, and we know that many of these things are as necessary as food and drink. We all realize that. We find that the result is that for the man and his family only 9 cents per meal remains. That is the result of figuring out a laborer's wages at $1.75 a day; so that on the whole there can not be any fair doubt that we pay better wages for serving in the Army to the enlisted man than a man can get as a common laborer.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I agreed to yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's speech, but I have been advised that what he did say was substantially in answer to what I said.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; it was in answer to the statement of the gentleman's colleague, Mr. BUTLER.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to dispute the gentleman's statement as to the wages paid in Pennsylvania in various lines. I have no idea where the gentleman got his information.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would set the gentleman upon his colleague.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ordinary common labor today in Pennsylvania gets $2 and $2.25 a day, and did before the munitions making began.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course, we have unusually good times under a Democratic administration; but that is not the customary thing and it is not the condition of affairs over the country as a whole.

There is one point to which I desire to advert. I do not like to cavil and complain unless I offer a remedy, and I want to offer a remedy for the undemocratic conditions that obtain, in my opinion, advanced with all seriousness and with consideration for everyone involved, in the American Army, and that is this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, that remedy is this: We must make it possible, we must make it easy, for men to pass from the enlisted ranks into the commissioned class. We must put all soldiers more on an equality. I submit, with all respect to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART], that there is nothing in the argument that to hold their obedience the officer must not treat the men as social equals. The supercilliousness with which the eastern despot clothes himself is unnecessary to command men.

The way to get respect in this world is to deserve respect. Never did a man who had authority back of him lack for obedience upon the part of those under him when he deserved to be obeyed, and when he had the manhood and the quality to deserve it. Do not let us think that we have to array ourselves in fine feathers like birds of paradise and claim to be better men than other men, in order to get them to obey us.

The thing we need to do is to make it easier for the common man to get into West Point. You all know that it is true that you can not get your boys into West Point, they can not stand the examinations, the examinations are too difficult. I want to nominate from my district some representatives of the common people of that district to West Point. I want to see the sons of the men who toil go to West Point and be put in positions of command. So far as I can I want to see to it that the Military Academy is a democratic institution where there are representatives of the great mass of the American people. But the common boys can not stand the examinations, they can not get in. The young fellow who gets into West Point has already got all of the education that an American boy has much use for.

That is the great trouble. What we have created in the American Army is not an aristocracy of birth, it is not even an aristocracy of place, but it is an aristocracy of culture. We have created a great gulf between the culture of the Army officer and the modest scholarship of the enlisted man. The Army officer, with all his education in languages, in arts, and sciences, is an aristocrat in all of the things that go to make a man a gentleman but not necessarily a soldier. We have qualified him to represent us in parlors and in the courts of the world, but it is not a qualification that is essential to representing the American people on the field of battle.

We are making at West Point an aristocracy of culture. Scarcely any of us have education equal to that of a man who has gone through the Military Academy. What connection is there between the study of languages and literature and being a soldier? What connection is there between the high academic standards maintained at the academy and the instruction which it takes to be a competent and fit man to command men, to lead when cannons belch and the battle roars? I submit that there is very little.

Let us put West Point where the sons of the common people can enter. Let us make it possible for the sons of common men to go to West Point, and thereby democratize that institution. At present because of the academy's difficult standards we are forced to select from among the few who have had the best educational advantages, from rich men's sons, from boys picked from the highest circles of American life. We put them in West Point and we polish them and work on them as though we would make rubies out of glass and diamonds out of pieces of common stone. The result of it all is we are vitiating the ideals for which our ancestors laid down their lives and for which American institutions stand.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. But some one has to devise the 16-inch gun that will land a shot on a mark 20 miles away.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is just the point. Why should you educate every American officer to be a skilled technologist in arms? Why undertake to make a man a specialist in any line unless he shows especial aptitude and excellence? My dear, sir, it is one of the most egregious wastes of education that ever existed. When we educate men for Army officers, let us select for special technical training only those that have shown special adaptability in those lines. Let us make ordnance officers out of those who show a special ability for it. Let us make an engineer out of the man who shows a natural turn as an engineer. Let us make specialists out of the men who are fit to specialize, but let us not undertake to make a specialist out of every sublieutenant we have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say a word. I have listened to many words and I recall the old text way back in holy writ, "Words darken counsel," and they do at times. I am inclined to think this is one of the times. [Laughter.] I want to ask the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, what proportion, if he recollects, of the officers in the Regular Army are graduates of West Point, and what part get in from the ranks and from civil life?

Mr. HAY. Really, I could not say; but there is a provision of law by which enlisted men can get into West Point, and, as a matter of fact, now there are in the Army of officers more men enlisted and from civil life than those who are graduates of West Point.

Mr. CANNON. That is my understanding.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CANNON. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One of my boys at West Point was enlisted in the Coast Artillery and he came to me with the Coast Artillery uniform on. He was drawing $11 a month and I appointed him, and he is one of the best boys in the service to-day.

Mr. CANNON. In the Marine Hospital Service, in the Revenue-Cutter Service, and in the Regular Army I am under the impression that from one-third to one-half of the men who enter the Army as officers come from the ranks and have to pass their examinations.

All men are not of the same size. Some children are born feeble-minded. We are caring for them. Fortunately, the feeble-minded do not come to Congress. [Laughter.] You know, some people have a cast in the eye; some are close-sighted and some are long-sighted, and sometimes there is a cast in the brain as well as in the eye. The best way is to be practical. Well, I sat here to-day and listened to Members talk while we were considering this bill, and there ought to be no disagreement about this bill and the amount of it. There is a real desire to have a bill sufficient for the public service at this time and for the future. [Applause.] But yet some Members say, "Oh, these big munition makers, these wicked makers of munitions, and all that kind of thing. Yes; there are a great many munition-of-war makers. Under the law of nations there is the right of the neutral to make munitions and sell them to combatants. There is one good thing coming out of it. There is preparedness in large part coming from the making of munitions and explosives. Why, I hear gentlemen who come from the cotton country inveigh against munition makers. Good heavens, your cotton that you raise is over one-half of it now being used for the high explosives. Had not you better clean your house at home before you rail at other citizens who produce explosives and munitions of war? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Our friends in the majority boast about the good times we have under this administration and then turn on the munition makers. I do not know but you will be turning on the cotton growers and turning on the people that get good prices for corn and for wheat. It arises under our present economical policy from the war in Europe, and nothing else, and I commend you to the condition for the first 8 and for the first 12 months after you put your economic policy upon the statute books before the European war. Oh, you may cry about good times and all that kind of thing. I will make no comment about your holiday other than to say, thank God, the majority, and the great majority, of our people are quite as bright as we are when it comes to the question of production and the question of prosperity, and all that kind of thing. Now, touching the officers, I never thought Crazy Bill Sherman, as the boys lovingly called him, went around shaking hands with the soldiers under his command. If he had done that he would have done nothing but that. He was a martinet. Yet those who were acquainted with him—and I had that honor—all the while knew of his affection for the private soldier. Take Grant. Why, Grant in the Battle of the Wilderness—God knows how many officers and private soldiers fell there—succeeded because he flanked Lee day after day without regard to the lives of men; but it was humanity and patriotism that made that sacrifice necessary.

Men of full age and with families are not going into the Army from the farms or from the shops unless there is a condition in the country which touches the heart, so that they feel that they fight for the flag and for our civilization. The young boys go. Of course they are patriotic. I call the attention of the House again, as I did on a former occasion, to the fact that a majority of the young men in the Union Army during the War for the Union were under 18 years of age when they enlisted. The young boys take chances that the older men do not take. I have no fear but that when the emergency arises the men will come. Why, they called out four regiments of the National Guard of Illinois. They left two regiments uncalled for. The Representatives in Congress from the districts of the regiments that were not called for are getting telegrams by the score asking "Why are we left out?" They want to go, and they are amongst the best of our population. They think there is an emergency. It does not make any difference whether I think there is an emergency or not. Some people who are inclined to criticize say it is a bluff. I do not say it is. We are to meet it here and not treat it as a bluff from the standpoint of preparedness, because the sentiment and the heart of the country is that the honor of the flag should be maintained and that American citizens, wherever they are to be found, must be protected, whether they be in Mexico or elsewhere, and the boys and men of this country are ready to give the lie to the statement that this great citizenship is too proud to fight. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in the matter of pay for the men in our Army and Navy this Government has been and is now pursuing a most miserly, unfair, and un-American policy. A mere pittance of 50 cents per day practically and effectually closed the service to those who may have others depending on them for support.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committee in charge of this bill have not properly or carefully considered this matter. Many of the men who are members of our National Guard are married and have families depending upon them for support; they have been called upon by the President to mobilize, and possibly later to be ordered to the border. These men are expected to serve under all conditions, as long as needed in defense of our country and flag, at the risk of their lives and health, and should receive at least $1 per day. I want to say right here that I would favor a law which would make the minimum pay of any soldier $1 a day. It should not be less. The National Guard has been organized for a number of years. A number of the members of the guard are married men now. They were single when they first enlisted. They have since married. They have been called upon to do field duty for two weeks each year. They are now married and have one, two, three, or more children. The question arises, and I have been asked within the last few days, "What shall we do?" If they do not enlist they will be accused of not being patriotic. If they do go, they will get the magnificent sum of 50 cents a day for the maintenance of their wives and children. What in the name of common sense are the wife and the two or three children to live on after paying rent, out of the $15.60 per month? Gentlemen, it is a serious question with these men. It is not a mere play upon words: Here is a man employed, earning perhaps $15 or $18 a week. He is willing to make the sacrifice for himself. He does not want a cent for himself, but he has his loved ones. He has his wife and children, and he is very possibly living in a house for which he is paying rent. Who shall take care of the dear ones whom he leaves at home?

The Good Book tells us that "Charity begins at home." Who is the more patriotic, the man enlisting in the service and leaving his wife and children upon charity or the man who says, "I have sworn before God and men to support this woman and these children. I am responsible for them. I will not desert them?" Is not this Government, that boasts of its billions, that appropriates hundreds of millions of dollars on enterprises of questionable value, able to pay at least a dollar a day for the maintenance of that wife and children while the father is making the sacrifice for you and me? It is not the same as with the young man who enlists in the Army at the age of 18 or 19. If you make it impossible for the married men to enlist and are going to take all of them out of the National Guard who are obliged to leave their wives and children at home, where are you going to get men to fill their places? I venture to say that in my district over one-half of the men who are members of the National Guard of the State of Pennsylvania are married men and have families to support. There are a few who are well to do who do not need to concern themselves about their wives and children, but I believe that when my colleague from Philadelphia [Mr. MOORE] called the attention of the committee to these conditions and offered an amendment raising the pay to $20 per month he performed a public duty. The only criticism I have is that he did not go far enough. If we want an army, we ought to be willing to pay for it. We ought to be willing to pay the men a sufficient amount of money so that their wives and children will not become objects of charity when they do enlist. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, messengers, and laborers, office of the Chief of Staff.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to this and the following lines. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether the clerks whose salaries are enumerated in lines 18 to 25, on page 10, and down to line 9, on page 11, are not employed in the department here, and if they should not be carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. HAY. No; they never have been. These are clerks, messengers, and laborers in the office of the Chief of Staff, and they have always been appropriated for on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not asking where they have heretofore been appropriated for. I am asking whether they are not employed here in the departmental service at Washington.

Mr. HAY. Some of them are and some are not.

Mr. STAFFORD. The office of the Chief of Staff is located here at Washington?

Mr. HAY. Yes; but I think some of them are sent to New York and other places.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are not those sent to New York and other places included in the next item?

Mr. HAY. Yes; they are.

Mr. STAFFORD. And is it not a fact that the clerks and other employees at Washington were separated from last year's appropriation act?

Mr. HAY. They have been separated. Does the gentleman wish to make a point of order to this?

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think these salaries should be carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. HAY. They have not been, and that bill is already a law, and if you make a point of order you cut them out.

Mr. STAFFORD. We can easily make provision for them in the general deficiency bill.

Mr. HAY. Very well, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make a point of order as to lines 16 to 25 on page 10 and lines 1 to 9 on page 11.

Mr. CANNON. Has not the Army bill always carried these appropriations?

Mr. HAY. Yes. I do not concede the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). The present occupant of the chair will state that the regular Chairman is temporarily absent from the Hall, and under all the circumstances if the gentleman from Wisconsin insists upon his point of order and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] does not concede it, the Acting Chairman would prefer that gentlemen let this go over until the regular Chairman returns.

Mr. HAY. I have no objection. I will state to the gentleman that the other item, beginning on line 1, is, of course, subject to a point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the gentleman ask unanimous consent to pass over temporarily that part of the bill beginning on line 16, page 10, and ending on line 9, page 11.

Mr. HAY. I understood it had been passed over. I ask unanimous consent to pass it by temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). Without objection, it will be passed over, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For commutation of quarters and of heat and light, $44,684: Provided, That hereafter headquarters clerks shall be known as Army field clerks and shall receive the same pay and allowances as now allowed by law to pay clerks, Quartermaster Corps, with the exception that Army field clerks at entrance into the service shall receive but $1,000 per annum for the first year of service: Provided further, That Army field clerks duly assigned to and performing the duties of chief clerks shall receive $250 per annum in addition to the regular pay of their respective grades while performing the duties of chief clerks: And provided further, That Army field clerks shall be subject to the Rules and Articles of War.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the proviso. I understand that this will increase the pay of the Army field clerks so that after serving 15 years they will receive $1,800 and after 10 years $1,600 and after 5 years' service $1,400.

Mr. HAY. This is an entirely new provision, and subject to a point of order. It provides for commutation of quarters and it also provides for the same pay and allowances now allowed to the pay clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's report gives considerable attention to the recommendation.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I quoted it in full, so that everybody might understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. The average salary of the Army field clerk is not over $1,200, and under the recommendation made here they will be much higher than that of the clerks in the service here. I am not in sympathy with the idea of singling out special clerks with such inordinate increases of salary as is provided for in this proviso, and I will make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia wish to be heard?

Mr. HAY. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to straighten out the matter, I ask unanimous consent to substitute, on pages 10 and 11, the law that passed last year for these clerks. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to take the place of these two provisions, where we have separated and undertaken to change the status of the clerks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to offer an amendment to take the place of paragraph beginning on line 16, page 10, of the bill, including line 7, page 12. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 10, line 15, by inserting the following:
"One chief clerk, at the office of the Chief of Staff, $2,250 per annum.
"Three clerks, at $2,000 each per annum.
"Twelve clerks, at $1,800 each per annum.
"Fifteen clerks, at $1,600 each per annum.
"Thirty-eight clerks, at $1,400 each per annum.
"Seventy clerks, at $1,200 each per annum.
"Sixty-five clerks, at $1,000 each per annum.
"Six clerks (Filipinos), at $500 each per annum.
"One captain of the watch, at $900 per annum.
"Three watchmen, at $720 each per annum.
"One gardener, at $720 per annum.
"One packer, at $840 per annum.
"Two messengers, at $840 each per annum.
"Fifty-nine messengers, at $720 each per annum.
"Six messengers (Filipinos), at $300 each per annum.
"One laborer, at $660 per annum.
"Two laborers, at $600 each per annum.
"Five charwomen, at $240 each per annum.
"In all, $312,690."

Mr. CANNON. What is the aggregate of the amendment?

Mr. HAY. In all, $312,690.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

For pay of officers of the Quartermaster Corps, $655,400.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, at the end of line 6, insert the following:

"Provided, That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and is hereby, authorized to appoint Charles P. Daly, chief clerk office of Quartermaster General, a military storekeeper in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain mounted, and the grade of military storekeeper is hereby revived in the Army of the United States for this purpose only."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order, but I have offered it at the request of Gen. Aleshire, Quartermaster General, and a large number of officers in his corps. This man is about 47 years of age. He has been in the service of the Army for 27 years. He served in China; he served in the Philippines; he served in every part of the United States, and he is a man of the most excellent character and has given most excellent service.

He will yet give many years of service before he can be retired. His pay now is $2,750. It will be $2,400 if this amendment is agreed to, and the purpose of the amendment is not so much on account of the money as to give him a permanent status. He has been chief clerk of the Quartermaster's Department for a good many years. He has just returned from a visit of inspection down in Mexico, where he has been for the purpose of ascertaining what our troops needed. He is a man of such ability that he is called upon in every emergency to render service. I desire to print with my remarks the recommendations which I have received from the Quartermaster Corps, Gen. Sharpe, one of the acting quartermaster generals, Col. Downey, and a great many others, and I think it is something that we ought to do for this very efficient public servant.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the recommendations referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The recommendations are as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, May 31, 1916.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I understand that Mr. Charles P. Daly, chief clerk, office of the Quartermaster General, is desirous of an appointment as military storekeeper, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army. I can not recommend Mr. Daly too highly. He has been associated with me as clerk in the Quartermaster's Department and Quartermaster Corps since April, 1900, and during the entire period has been performing duties in the Quartermaster Corps that would be required of military storekeepers, for which office he is eminently qualified.

Mr. Daly joined me as a clerk while I was chief quartermaster at Santiago, Cuba, serving from April, 1900, to July, 1900. From this station he accompanied me as follows:

Tientsin, China, where he served as chief clerk of the office of the depot quartermaster, of which I had charge, from October 1, 1900, to March 3, 1901.

Manila, P. I., where he served as chief clerk of the office of quartermaster, transport service of which I had charge, from April 1, 1901, to January, 1903.

In January, 1903, the offices of the depot quartermaster, water transportation, and land transportation were consolidated, and Mr. Daly served as chief clerk until August, 1903, when I was ordered to Washington.

Washington, D. C., where he served as chief clerk in charge of the settlement of my accounts. The records show that disbursements had been made to the amount of approximately $9,000,000. The accounts were closed by the accounting officials of the Treasury Department, the only shortage being some property valued at $2.36.

Upon the settlement of the accounts above referred to Mr. Daly was transferred to the office of the Quartermaster General, where he served as clerk from April, 1906, to March, 1911. It was my pleasure to appoint Mr. Daly chief clerk of the office of the Quartermaster General in March, 1911, since which time he has performed the duties of the office most energetically, tactfully, and efficiently.

Mr. Daly has been in the employ of the Government in various capacities for more than 27 years, and I know of no one who has rendered more faithful and valuable service to the Government. He has earned the appointment which he seeks, and which, in my opinion, it would be in the interests of the service to make. I therefore earnestly recommend favorable legislative action to accomplish the same.

A brief statement showing Mr. Daly's service is inclosed.

Very sincerely, yours,

J. B. ALESHIRE.

SYNOPSIS RECORD OF CHARLES P. DALY.

Record shows entry into service of the Quartermaster's Department as teamster March 29, 1889, and served in the following positions: Foreman, assistant transportation agent, and clerk in the various grades to March, 1911, when appointed chief clerk, Office of the Quartermaster General, in which capacity is now employed.

Service has been continuous since first appointment.

Served through the Spanish-American War as quartermaster clerk, and was with the First Cavalry Brigade from May, 1898, throughout the campaign in Cuba leading up to the surrender of Santiago to August 31, 1898, and later, about December, 1899, assigned to duty as chief clerk, Chief Quartermaster's Office, Department of Habana; later, May, 1900, as chief clerk, Chief Quartermaster's Office, Department of Santiago, Cuba. Served as chief clerk, Depot Quartermaster's Office, Tientsin, China, during the Boxer uprising in China; later, chief clerk, Water Transportation and Depot Quartermaster's Office, Manila, P. I.

Is considered an authority on questions of transportation and supply.

The supply of the United States forces at Tientsin and at Peking, China, during the Boxer uprising in 1900, presented many difficulties. Mr. Daly assisted in the handling of this difficult problem, and his services were of great value in the successful conduct of the whole question of the supply of the troops in China.

In 1903 he assisted in the consolidation of the three offices of the Quartermaster's Department in Manila, known as the Depot Quartermaster, Water Transportation, and Land Transportation into one office, known as Depot Quartermaster. This consolidation was successfully effected, and as a result material savings in operating expenses were made.

Had charge of the disbursement of several millions of dollars during the years 1900 to 1903, inclusive, and had in his charge and under his control large amounts of currency without a deficiency of one cent.

In 1907 and 1908 assisted in working out the plan of decentralization of the duties of the Quartermaster's Department, which has been in successful operation for the past eight years and which has greatly increased the efficiency in the furnishing of supplies to the Army.

In 1913 assisted in the working out and putting into effect a system of property accounting which greatly reduced paper work and which provided a record in the Quartermaster General's Office showing approximately a daily balance of property on hand at all posts.

Assisted in the working out and making effective the centralized purchase of all articles of a staple commercial class supplied by the Quartermaster Corps for the Army. Under this plan the Government secured a better quality of article and lower prices than heretofore secured. Considerable savings made under this plan.

Assisted in the working out of the consolidation of the office establishments of the Paymaster General, Commissary General, and Quartermaster General into the office of the Chief of the Quartermaster Corps (now Quartermaster General) under the provisions of the act of Congress approved August 24, 1912.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, May 31, 1916.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I understand that Mr. C. P. Daly, chief clerk, Quartermaster General's Office, desires to secure an appointment as a military storekeeper.

It is a great pleasure to state that Mr. Daly is well and favorably known to me, and for the past four years has been intimately associated with me whenever I have acted as Quartermaster General. He is a man of high character and unusual ability, and is conscientious, faithful, and a hard worker. He has, too, had actual experience in every field of activity in the Quartermaster Corps, and is altogether the best equipped man in his line of work I have ever known.

If appointed to the position contemplated, he will bring to that position all of his experience, ability, and judgment, and insure to the department his continued and valuable service; and at the same time it will be a most deserved recognition and reward for long, faithful, and valuable service rendered.

Yours, sincerely,

HENRY G. SHARPE,
Brigadier General, Quartermaster Corps,
Acting Quartermaster General.

Gen. J. B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Having been informed that Mr. Charles P. Daly is seeking appointment to the position of military storekeeper, with the rank of captain, mounted, in the Quartermaster Department, I hasten to communicate with you in the hope that a letter of commendation from me may be of some little assistance in enabling Mr. Daly to succeed in getting this appointment.

I have known Mr. Daly for a long time, and whereas I feel sure that his association with you is sufficient to give you all the necessary knowledge of his superior ability, I would like to express to you my feelings on the subject as to what a valuable addition he would make to the commissioned personnel of the Quartermaster Corps, and to further state that I feel his great service to that corps in the past could only be partially recognized by this appointment.

I am sure that his marked ability on all matters connected with the business affairs of the present Quartermaster Corps would be most valuable to the department, and I unhesitatingly recommend him to you for your consideration in the highest terms, and I am firmly of the belief that his appointment would be a great service to the Government.

Respectfully,

G. F. DOWNEY,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps.
JUNE 9, 1916.

To Mr. DALY:

I concur in the views and recommendation of Col. G. F. Downey, assistant to the department quartermaster, Eastern Department.

Maj. Gen. JAMES B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General, United States Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: I understand that there is a proposition to have legislation enacted by Congress which would bring about the appointment of Mr. Charles P. Daly, chief clerk of the Quartermaster General's office, as military storekeeper, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain, mounted.

It is a great pleasure to state that I think this would be a very suitable reward for the excellent service rendered by Mr. Daly to the Army generally and to the Quartermaster Corps specifically. The work Mr. Daly has done and is doing merits recognition of this kind, and I sincerely hope that it will be brought about.

With best regards and good wishes, I am,

Yours, most sincerely,

WILLIAM E. HORTON,
Lieutenant Colonel, Quartermaster Corps.

MY DEAR GENERAL: Having learned that Charles P. Daly will be considered for appointment as military storekeeper, I would like, without appearing presumptuous, to bring to your attention impressions gained by me of Mr. Daly's work in particular instances, for such use and consideration as you see fit to give.

I came in contact with Mr. Daly while I was Department Quartermaster, Central Department, at the time consolidation was being put into effect. I was greatly impressed with his suggestions and inspirations to the clerical force, upon whom the success of the scheme depended, and the service in the Central Department certainly benefited by his assistance at this time.

Again, in April, 1914—when the first field army was being organized for service in Mexico—as chief quartermaster of that force I was, by your permission, free to make use of Mr. Daly's knowledge in order to get tabulated the necessary information to prepare advance requisitions and outline a scheme for the best supply of the force. I am under obligations to Mr. Daly for cheerfully working on this matter for me on Sunday and at nights, with the assistance of other clerks equally willing, in his branch of your office. The expedition never sailed, but had it done so I feel that the assistance given by Mr. Daly at this time would have been of much benefit to the service.

I refer to these occasions where the work and enthusiasm, without other stimulus than interest in the corps, illustrate the character of this employee, and the fact that his service as military storekeeper would be invaluable to the Army.

With kindest regards,

Sincerely, yours,

A. L. SMITH,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps.

GENERAL: It is a matter of personal gratification to me to be able to commend for favorable consideration the appointment of Charles P. Daly, chief clerk, Quartermaster General's Office, as military storekeeper, with the rank of captain, mounted.

From intimate association with Mr. Daly in the Office of the Quartermaster General, covering nearly five years, I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Daly's work, in connection with the present system of accounting for money and property, for the organization and system of the Quartermaster General's Office, for the close correlation existing between that office and the Quartermaster Corps at large, and for marked economies in expenditure which have been effected in the Quartermaster Corps since 1907—these and many other measures of importance, all to the benefit of the service and administration of the War Department, have been of incalculable value to the Government.

Aside, therefore, from any personal reward or recognition which, in my opinion, his services amply merit, I consider that Mr. Daly could be of still further service to the Government in keeping a closer touch between the office of the Quartemaster General and the Quartermaster Corps at large if he were clothed with commissioned rank and the prestige accompanying it.

In my opinion his appointment as military storekeeper with the rank of captain, mounted, would be a highly desirable appointment in the interests of the service.

Very respectfully,

D. S. STANLEY,
Lieutenant Colonel, Quartermaster Corps.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I understand that an effort is being made to have the chief clerk, Charles P. Daly, appointed military storekeeper, with rank, pay, and allowances of a captain, mounted. I am not surprised that an effort is being made to get Daly a commission and regret that it was not done several years ago. I consider him the most valuable civilian employee in the War Department and in every way qualified for a commission in the Army, with the rank of a captain, or even a higher rank.

He has by his close attention to duty, his wide experience in all branches of quartermaster work, his knowledge of a quartermaster's duties and responsibilities, his executive ability, and the splendid work he has already done for the Quartermaster Corps, merited a commission in the Army

Mr. Daly is a clean, upright man, who will do honor to the position, and whose promotion will have the approval of every one in the Army who knows him and the work he has done.

Subject: Mr. Charles P. Daly; appointment of, as military storekeeper in the Quartermaster Corps with rank of captain.

1. Understanding that Mr. Daly is an applicant for appointment to the position and rank named above, I desire to add my testimony as to his eminent fitness for the position and to recommend him in the highest terms as deserving a reward for his long, most efficient, and faithful service in the Quartermaster Corps.

2. I have known Mr. Daly for many years, during which time he has occupied almost every clerical position in the corps, from the lowest to highest, under all conditions of service. He has demonstrated unusual ability, aptitude, and great capacity for work, and I know of no one more thoroughly familiar with the difficult and wide scope of work which comes under the Quartermaster Corps or who is more deserving of advancement for loyal service rendered to the Government.

Gen. JAMES B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General of the Army,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

GENERAL: In the increase of the Army and consequent extension of the duties of the Quartermaster Corps, it is desired to submit the following recommendation:

(1) It is recommended that the grade of military storekeeper or supervisor of stores be created in the Quartermaster Corps, with the rank of captain.

(2) That the number of this grade shall be limited to one.

(3) That, with the sanction of Congress, the position be filled by the appointing of Mr. Charles P. Daly, chief clerk and assistant to the Quartermaster General.

Mr. Daly has from the period of the reorganization of the Quartermaster Corps, rendered invaluable service, equaled only by the Quartermaster General himself, to the corps in outlining all the administrative methods and preparing the details of administration and organization upon which the success of the reorganization work of the corps has depended.

Mr. Daly's services in the Quartermsater Corps extends over a period of 27 years, during all of which time he has been a close student of organization economics and methods of administration, in which line of work he is an expert of the highest class. Personally I have, since coming on duty in the office of the Quartermaster General in October, 1912, daily consulted Mr. Daly in the work of the Transportation Division, of which I have had charge. His knowledge of administrative methods, and a proper regard for the economics, his accuracy of judgment, and quick grasp of any complicated situation connected with the department has never failed to solve the most difficult problems. I do not know Mr. Daly's equal in attainments and capacity for work in the civilian force of the Army.

It is urgently recommended that he be placed in such a position that his qualifications and attainments may be constantly utilized by the department without any chance of their being lost through any cause. It may be added that the action proposed would be but a meager reward for his valuable and indefatigable services.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: Referring to the conversation between yourself and Gen. Aleshire yesterday morning, concerning the estimates under Quartermaster Corps appropriations for the fiscal year 1917, I beg to advise you that the estimates submitted by this office at the hearings held by your committee commencing March 28, 1916, a summary of which is shown in the table on page 30 of the hearings, covered pay, subsistence, transportation, and other quartermaster supplies for 105,590 enlisted men in the line of the Army and 24,411 enlisted men in the staff corps and departments, including the Philippine Scouts, or a total of 130,001 enlisted men, being the first increment under H. R. 12766 as it originally passed the House of Representatives, and the increment authorized by H. J. Res 180, as shown in the table on page 57 of the hearings.

It will be noted from the table on page 30 that the total of the estimates pertaining to the Quartermaster Corps is $121,619,539.78, and it is the opinion of this office that if that amount is appropriated it will be sufficient to provide for the first increment under H. R. 12766 as recently reported by the conferees.

Very respectfully,

Acting Quartermaster General.

Subject: Captain's commission for Mr. Charles P. Daly, assistant and chief clerk to the Quartermaster General.

Information is at hand to the effect that Maj. Gen. James B. Aleshire, Quartermaster General of the Army, has interested himself in obtaining legislation appointing his assistant and chief clerk, Mr. Charles P. Daly, a military storekeeper, with the rank, pay, and allowance of a captain, mounted.

The undersigned, quartermaster clerks on duty at the depot quartermaster's office, Chicago, are earnestly desirous of doing all in their power to assist and to contribute to the accomplishment of the purpose of Gen. Aleshire in securing the desired legislation. From personal contact and personal knowledge we gladly testify to the wisdom of Gen. Aleshire's action in wishing to secure a captain's commission for Mr. Daly. We know of our own knowledge that Mr. Daly is the most thoroughly informed and best-posted civilian employee of the Quartermaster Corps, and his knowledge has been gained by actual experience in all phases of Quartermaster Corps work in posts, in headquarters, depots, and in the field in the United States, Cuba, China, the Philippines, and Mexico. Mr. Daly is known to all of us as a gentleman of clean, high character, splendid judgment, and an authority on all matters pertaining to the supply of the Army.

The undersigned earnestly pray that the captain's commission be given to Mr. Daly as desired by Gen. Aleshire.

Maj. Gen. JAMES B. ALESHIRE,
Quartermaster General of the Army,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I have learned unofficially that legislation is contemplated, with your approval, which, if enacted, will enable the appointment of Mr. Charles P. Daly, chief clerk of your office, as a military storekeeper with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain, mounted.

This information is highly gratifying to me as fittingly conveying an adequate recognition of and reward for the most valuable services rendered by Mr. Daly to the Government, not only in the extraordinary efficiency with which he has performed the duties of chief clerk of your office but also for the admirable manner in which he has assisted in carrying out your plans for the improvement of the Quartermaster Corps generally throughout the service.

In my opinion Mr. Daly's long and arduous service, combined with his wide and varied experience in the workings of the Quartermaster Corps in its relations to the general Military Establishment, entitles him to a position in the Army, which will be at once a distinct appreciation of his merit and an assurance that the Government will continue to have the benefit of his abilities with a military standing measurably commensurate with his genuine worth. I have known Mr. Daly for many years, both officially and personally, having had the most favorable opportunities for observing and recognizing his ability in an administrative and executive capacity while I was on duty in your office, and since then I have had an opportunity to favorably judge of the influence and beneficial effect of his work in its bearing upon the Quartermaster Corps at large and in the field.

I sincerely trust that the proposed legislation in Mr. Daly's behalf will be successfully accomplished and I shall be very glad to extend to him a hearty welcome as a commissioned officer.

I have written to Mr. Daly personally to-day a letter which he may use. I have told him also that I am writing to you expressing my pleasure at the news that this measure is contemplated and adding my earnest recommendation to yours for the success of the proposed bill.

Respectfully,
H. L. ROGERS,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps, Department Quartermaster.

From: Lieut. Col. B. F. Cheatham, Quartermaster Corps.
To: Maj. Gen. J. B. Aleshire, Quartermaster General, United States Army, Washington, D. C.

1. It has come to my attention that it is contemplated to introduce a bill before Congress to provide for the appointment of Mr. Charles P. Daly as military storekeeper, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain.

2. I have known Mr. Daly for about 10 years, and have been in a position to observe him carefully, and desire to express to you my earnest hope that this item may promptly become law.

3. Mr. Daly is peculiarly worthy to have this reward after many years of most arduous and highly valuable service for the Government. He is conspicuous in ability and second to none in energy and integrity.

4. In my opinion it would have been extremely difficult for the present Quartermaster General to have accomplished the many radical improvements in systems of supply and other vital questions of administration in the Quartermaster Corps had it not been for the intelligent assistance of Mr. Daly in working out the multitudinous details.

GENERAL: Understanding that Mr. C. P. Daly is a candidate for the office of military storekeeper, I desire to add a few words of personal tribute to those of others who are interested in his behalf.

It has been my good fortune to know Mr. Daly for a number of years, and I believe no member of the clerical force knows the Quartermaster Corps better than he nor is more entitled to recognition. If he is successful, his work and capabilities will prove exceedingly useful to the technical work of the Quartermaster Corps. I hope he will receive the honor he deserves.

Maj. Gen. J. B. ALESHIRE, United States Army,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I understand that action is contemplated to procure legislation, if possible, to give your assistant and chief clerk, Mr. Charles P. Daly, the designation of military storekeeper, with the rank, pay, and allowances of a captain.

I hope this is true, as I consider such action highly commendable—a fitting tribute to his exceptional ability and untiring efforts to better our branch of the service. Those of us who know Mr. Daly personally recognize his mature judgment, breadth of view, and thoroughness of method. We consider him authority on all matters pertaining to the supply of the Army. Furthermore, his personality and character are an inspiration to us all.

I shall greatly appreciate any efforts made to procure for Mr. Daly this deserved recognition.

WAR DEPARTMENT,

Hon. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: I beg leave to transmit herewith a memorandum of The Adjutant General of the Army recommending the enactment of legislation providing that one of the enlisted men detached from the Army at large for the performance of duty at each of the recruit depots under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 12, 1906, shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental sergeant major.

In transmitting this recommendation, with which I fully concur for the reasons stated in the memorandum, I beg leave to suggest that the object sought can be readily accomplished by including in the act making appropriation for support of the Army for the next ensuing fiscal year, or in any one of the other acts of Congress affecting the Army generally, a provision that one of the enlisted men detached from the Army at large for duty at each recruit depot shall, while so detached and performing such duty, have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental sergeant major.

It is deemed proper to add that a letter of similar import has been addressed by me to-day to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate.

Very respectfully,
LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, June 19, 1916.

Hon. JAMES HAY,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HAY: Upon an examination of the printed copy of the draft of the bill making appropriation for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, submitted on the 16th instant, it is observed that the bill does not contain a provision that one of the enlisted men detached from the Army at large for the performance of duty at each of the recruit depots shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental sergeant major.

I take a keen interest in this matter, and this interest impels me to venture to write you this personal letter for the purpose of ascertaining whether the provision referred to was overlooked or whether there is any reason that precludes its inclusion in the bill. If the former, I venture to express the hope that you can see your way clear to include in the bill a provision along the lines suggested in the inclosed copy of a letter of the Secretary of War and memorandum of this office for the relief of these deserving men.

Very respectfully,
H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

[Memorandum for the Secretary of War.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

The act of Congress approved June 12, 1906 (34 Stat. L., 242), provides as follows:

"Hereafter the Secretary of War shall be authorized to detach from the Army at large such number of enlisted men as may be necessary to perform duties at the various recruit depots * * *, and of the enlisted men so detached, while performing such duty, there shall be allowed for each recruit depot * * * one who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of battalion or squadron sergeant major * * *."

Under the authority cited there is now on duty at each of the five recruit depots, Fort Slocum, N. Y.; Columbus Barracks, Ohio; Jefferson Barracks, Mo.; Fort Logan, Colo.; and Fort McDowell, Cal., one battalion sergeant major who receives the pay incident to that grade. His work includes the supervision of all the correspondence incident to the administration of the depot to which he is assigned, and is of a very exacting nature, fully as exacting and far more onerous than the similar duties performed by the regimental sergeant major authorized for each regiment of Infantry under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 22, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 750).

While the work of the regimental sergeant major, authorized under the act of Congress last cited, consists of the supervision of the correspondence incident to the administration of a regiment of Infantry having an enlisted strength of 872 men, the battalion sergeant major at a recruit depot has supervision over the correspondence incident to all the men who are enlisted or rejected at the particular depot concerned, as well as the correspondence incident to the permanent personnel of the depot and a large number of enlisted men sent casually to such depot for various purposes from time to time.

Within the fiscal year ended June 30, 1915, 32,832 men were enlisted and 5,633 rejected at the five recruit depots, a total of 38,915, or an average of 7,703 for each depot. In addition to this number there were several thousand casuals forwarded to and from Hawaii and the Philippine Islands, who passed through Fort McDowell, and also many casuals sent to the several depots for discharge on surgeon's certificate of disability, for trial by court-martial, and for other reasons. These men, sent casually to the depots, together with the permanent enlisted personnel of the depots, 1,334 in number, augmented appreciably the average number of enlisted men that passed through the depots and concurrently increased the depot correspondence and the work of the sergeant major connected therewith.

In connection with this subject it is deemed proper to quote the following extracts from the annual reports of the various depot commanders:

FISCAL YEAR 1913.

Fort Slocum, N. Y.: "To secure the highest efficiency it is suggested that there be assigned to this depot 1 sergeant major, regimental; 3 sergeants major, battalion, and 2 color sergeants; * * *. By this method the chief of each division—correspondence, returns, and recruit record—would be a battalion sergeant major, under the general supervision of a regimental sergeant major, and the chief clerks in each, sergeants."

Columbus Barracks, Ohio: "I also renew my recommendation that the depot sergeant major be given regimental rank. Greater efficiency and more work are required of this noncommissioned officer than of a regimental sergeant major."

Jefferson Barracks, Mo.: "The sergeant major, by law, has the rank only of a battalion sergeant major. His duties are of an exacting nature and are similar to but more complex even than those of a regimental sergeant major. Steps should be taken to have this changed so as to give him the rank and pay of a regimental sergeant major or a sergeant (first class) Quartermaster Corps."

Fort Logan, Colo.: "In connection with the enlisted personnel, I would renew my recommendation that the depot sergeant major be given the grade of regimental sergeant major."

FISCAL YEAR 1914.

Fort Slocum, N. Y.: "The sergeant major by law has the rank of a battalion sergeant major. His duties are of an exacting nature and are similar to but more complex even than those of a regimental sergeant major. Steps should be taken to have this changed so as to give him the rank and pay of a regimental sergeant major.

"In considering this matter it should be borne in mind that this office handles 9,000 communications a year in the correspondence division; the returns division has to deal with a garrison of fluctuating strength, which under normal conditions numbers from 1,000 to 1,500 men, including a strength of casuals sent here for discharge on surgeon's certificate of disability or to be tried and dishonorably discharged. The recruit record division handles the papers of some 8,000 recruits annually, and upon every descriptive and assignment card are four or more entries, involving pecuniary responsibility."

Columbus Barracks, Ohio: "Recommendation—that the rank and pay of the depot sergeant major be made those of a regimental sergeant major."

Jefferson Barracks, Mo.: "I renew the recommendation made by several of my predecessors that the sergeant major, who by law has the rank only of a battalion sergeant major, be given the rank of regimental sergeant major. The work which a depot sergeant major has to supervise is much more than that of a regimental post, and the number and rank of men employed in his office under his direction is greater than in a corresponding office at a regimental post."

Fort Logan, Colo.: "In connection with the enlisted personnel, it is recommended that the depot sergeant major be given the grade of regimental sergeant major."

FISCAL YEAR 1915.

Fort Slocum, N. Y.: "The sergeant major of the depot should have the rank and emoluments of a regimental sergeant major."

Columbus Barracks, Ohio: "Recommendation is renewed that the depot sergeant major be given the rank and pay of a regimental sergeant major."

Jefferson Barracks, Mo.: "Recommendation—that the sergeant major of recruit depots be promoted to senior grade or be made a sergeant, first class, Quartermaster Corps. His duties are largely clerical. Sergeant clerks in the same office and under his supervision receive more pay than he does."

Fort Logan, Colo.: "Recommended that depot sergeant major be given the grade of regimental sergeant major."

Fort McDowell, Cal.: "Increase the rank of the present battalion sergeant major to that of regimental sergeant major. The responsibility involved and the knowledge necessary fully justify an increase in rank. From the very nature of his duties he should be senior (par. 9, Army Regulations) to every other noncommissioned officer at the depot." (Paragraph 9, Army Regulations, shows that a regimental sergeant major is the highest noncommissioned rank that can be attained.)

It is recommended that legislation be requested authorizing that there shall be allowed for each recruit depot one enlisted man, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental sergeant major.

The object sought can readily be accomplished by including in the act making appropriation for the support of the Army for the next ensuing fiscal year, or in any one of the other acts of Congress affecting the Army generally, a provision as follows (p. 9, line 20):

"Provided, That hereafter one of the enlisted men detached from the Army at large for duty at each recruit depot under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 12, 1906, shall, while so detached and performing such duty, have the rank, pay, and allowances of a regimental sergeant major."

H. P. McCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

DECEMBER 22, 1915.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are many other worthy chief clerks and other clerks in the department who would be entitled to the same recognition as this unquestioned worthy official, but to single out by special legislation this particular official and advance him to the grade of captain, giving him the retirement privileges of military life, would be, in my opinion, a piece of favoritism unwarranted, and it would work to the disorganization of the service in the department. There are many men down there, engineers, who are just as worthy and who would be entitled to appointment into the military arm of the service, just as much as this gentleman. I do not question that he has performed capable service in the past. It was his duty to do so, and the Congress has recognized it in the salary that he is receiving. For us to single out upon the recommendation even of the chief of the bureau, this man and grant him advancement in the military arm of the service as a captain is somewhat abhorrent to me, and accordingly I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

One superintendent, Nurse Corps, at $1,800 per annum, $1,800: Provided, That hereafter the superintendent shall receive such allowances of quarters, subsistence, and medical care during illness as may be prescribed in regulations by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the proviso.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order. I will only say that this provision has been in the bill for some years, and we put in the word "hereafter" this time so as to avoid carrying it constantly in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order. I think perhaps that I have made a mistake.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression at the time that this was a new provision in the bill, but I recall now that we have been carrying it annually.

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to whoever is the superintendent of the Nurse Corps receiving the same pay and allowances that that person is getting now, and I have no objection to making it permanent law as far as that is concerned, and I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Additional pay for length of service, $12,320.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 23, page 13, insert the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause to be prepared, with as much expedition as may be consistent with thoroughness, a revision and codification of the military laws of the United States, which shall conform in scope and character to the revision and codification of the laws of the United States of a permanent and general nature directed by the act of March 3, 1901. The Secretary of War shall submit to Congress a report of progress of the revision and codification herein directed upon the first day of the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and, when the revision and codification is completed he shall cause a copy of the same, in print, to be submitted to Congress, that the statutes so revised and codified may be reenacted if Congress shall so determine.

"For paying the expenses of clerical hire and printing and other expenses incident to the making of the revision and codification herein directed, such sum as may be necessary, not to exceed $5,000, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary therefor."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it must be obvious to all Members of the House that if we could get a revision and codification of any part of the statutes of the United States of America that have been written on the statute books since the last revision of 1878 we would all be grateful and public business undoubtedly would be expedited, with a great saving in expense of administration. This amendment proposes to bring the military law of the United States up to date in such revision and codification. I have only to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that under the terms of the act referred to in the amendment a draft of such revision and codification has already been made, taking the law up to 1910, so that if the law accumulating since 1910 is prepared in the same manner and added to that draft or incorporated into it we shall have submitted to us in the course of a very short time, comparatively, a complete revision up to date. Of course, there may be some detail in that former draft of the codification and revision that it will be necessary to rewrite, but the task has largely been put out of the way through the work that was done under that former act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the gentleman's proposal, would it not be a continuing authority in the Secretary of War to have a codification made from time to time? There is no limitation, so far as the gentleman's amendment goes, as to when this codification is to take place. I certainly think there ought to be some provision as to time when the work shall be completed. Under this phraseology the Secretary of War would be perennially authorized to keep on making a codification.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no. If the gentleman will recall, the amendment provides distinctly that the Secretary of War shall submit to Congress a report of progress on the revision and codification upon the first day of the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, and when the revision is "completed" he shall cause a copy of the same in print to be submitted to Congress. There is a completion provided for. It is not continuing.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is directed that he shall make a provisional report on the first day of the next session, but there is no provision whatsoever as to when the codification is to be completed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will simply say to the gentleman that the phraseology of this proposed amendment was drawn by the Judge Advocate General of the Army at my request.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Do I understand that this compilation has practically been completed by the Judge Advocate General?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It has not practically been completed, no.

Mr. BORLAND. How far has it gotten along?

Mr. MANN. It could not have gone very far with the recently passed reorganization bill.

Mr. BORLAND. It could have been brought up to the recently passed reorganization bill, and I am asking now——

Mr. MANN. I think the purpose is to bring it down in connection with the reorganization bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; and I wanted to explain further about that.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish the gentleman would explain what is the compilation they have now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Under the terms of the act that is referred to in the resolution the general revision of the statutes was proceeding and they continued those labors up to 1910. In connection with that, of course, the War Department has, as all departments do for their own convenience, kept the statutes from time to time in some form of compilation, so a large part of the ground work of such revision has been surveyed, at least marked out and lined up, which will prove to be of great usefulness when the finishing of the work is undertaken. The act of June 3, 1916, which is to be in most part effective the 1st of July, is not embraced at all, and it is so revolutionary in character and contains that customary clause, "Provided, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent, and so forth, are hereby repealed," that it has left the whole existing law just at this critical time somewhat in a measure of doubt in many particulars.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that this authority the gentleman is seeking to give the Judge Advocate General is, as has been pointed out, a sort of continuing authority. If we enact it into law he may report progress of the Sixty-fourth Congress, he may report progress to the next succeeding 10 or 12 Congresses, and we will be carrying an appropriation here in each appropriation act for the continuation of this compilation. If there was a compilation in existence, it seems to me the Judge Advocate General must have such a working tool in his office; to have it published once for all would be a very good thing; but there ought to be some limitation as to when this work is to be done and when it is to be completed and how much it is going to cost.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This is not intended as a compilation——

Mr. BORLAND. No; a revision.

Mr. MANN. That is just the distinction the gentleman wants to make. A codification. Of course, the office has a compilation, but a compilation of statutes is an entirely different thing, and no one knows that better than the gentleman from Missouri, from a codification. A compilation takes all of these statutes along, keeping them intact, with memoranda relating one to the other; but a codification is to bring them all into one enactment. Now, it can not be possible to have but one codification of the military laws, because the intention of this amendment is to have the War Department prepare the codification and for Congress to enact it, and not a compilation. Of course, everybody knows how much that would be——

Mr. BORLAND. There is no question but we have been trying to get a codification or a revision of the laws of the United States. and we have not succeeded, and we have spent a good deal of money to continue that work.

Mr. MANN. We codified the judicial title and we codified the criminal code. I dare say those codifications saved a great many thousands of dollars, and I do not know how much more money and effort to people all over the United States and to the Members of this House. It is easy enough to turn to the codification of the judicial title and find out what you want to know about the court. It is easy enough to turn to the Criminal Code to know what the criminal statute is, whereas before it was an impossibility, except with the greatest kind of research.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman will yield, there are not a great many statutes of the United States relating to our Military Establishment.

Mr. HAY. There is a book of them, my friend.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Here is a compilation of the War Department up to date, which it uses for its own unofficial use, I might say.

Mr. BORLAND. Most of that is obsolete.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is not; this is the last compilation.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me if this proposition could be limited so that the report was made at the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress it would be a desirable thing; but I do not think he should be given continuous authority. Our experience has been it never might come to an end.

Mr. HAY. Let me suggest that the gentleman change his amendment so it will be continuing after a certain time he may fix.

Mr. MANN. It does not continue now.

Mr. HAY. Say in 1918.

Mr. MANN. After they report the codification to Congress, that ends it. I hold in my hand what is entitled "The Military Laws of the United States and Supplement to the Military Laws of the United States," down to the index.

Mr. BORLAND. We have more military laws than soldiers, according to that.

Mr. MANN. Without including the supplement, running down, it runs down to page 1116 and commences with the executive, on page 5. Now, I assume the codification will commence with the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. BORLAND. No; the Constitution would not be in there.

Mr. MANN. But the main feature would be covered by the codification—would be covered in a volume of this size, of 250 pages, and of statute pages—probably 150 pages. This goes over 1,000 pages or 1,100 pages. I do not know whether it could be done for $5,000, but I know if it can be done for that and we can enact it——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit—before I undertook this little errand on the floor, of course, I tried to get the opinion of the people in the War Department who would have to perform the labor, and I need not, I hope, suggest to the gentleman that I acted in this matter on my own initiative, not from some prompting by them. When I took my errand down to the War Department I found to my great gratification that they were just as happy as a boy with a new kite to think somebody would undertake to do it for them. The Judge Advocate General was very anxious to have the whole matter buttoned up and to get it done, more particularly as he is now busy with this new reorganization matter.

Mr. BORLAND. I suggest to the gentleman that he change his amendment to say that the Judge Advocate General submit the codification at the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. With all this present upset between now and December?

Mr. BORLAND. The reorganization bill has been passed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand, but——

Mr. MANN. I do not think they can do this before next March.

Mr. BORLAND. Then, we had better wait until they are ready to make the codification.

Mr. MANN. They can not be ready until they have the authority to go ahead with it. They have no authority or force to codify it. It is of no advantage to them to have a codification that is not enacted.

Mr. BORLAND. If they are not ready to codify now, after the Army reorganization bill has passed, I do not know when they will be ready.

Mr. MANN. A codification that is not law does not do them any good. It is the compilation that they use in their office, as the gentleman and I have to use the compilation of the Statutes of the United States now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. A large part of the time of the Judge Advocate General now is being employed in passing on constructions of this new reorganization act, showing at once the necessity for revision and codification.

Mr. BORLAND. That all goes to show that they are not ready to make a codification that will be of any use.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will it not be acceptable to the gentleman to have this work finished within two years? They should be given time to prepare a proper codification.

Mr. BORLAND. I would agree to an absolute limit of two years.

Mr. DOWELL. You had better make it one year.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent to amend my proposed amendment by inserting, in the third line, after the word "thoroughness," the words "to be finished within two years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "Provided" at the beginning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to strike out the word "Provided." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The provision here and further on for the Judge Advocate's office amounts to about $115,000. I trust that every dollar of that will be used in establishing justice among the officers and men of the Army and no part of it for oppression. This afternoon the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], supplemented by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], did a distinctive public service. While I believe that discipline in the Army is absolutely necessary, and that the insignia of rank and grade must be kept clear and well established, yet the idea that seems to prevail in this country that the standard of the soldier in America shall follow and conform to the standard of the soldier of the Continent, and that the bearing and demeanor of the officers of the United States shall follow and conform to the bearing, demeanor, and conduct of the officer of the Continent, will not be long tolerated in America, and if tolerated in America we can not expect our military arm to prosper and succeed.

I make these remarks for the reason that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] depicted clearly the conduct of our officers generally toward their men. An instance has arisen in this country during the last three years that demands that officialdom of our Army must to some extent be democratized, or the position of the soldier must be magnified and dignified. Otherwise the impassable gulf between man and officer will be such that we can not expect in the Regular Army at least that efficiency to which we are entitled. The case I have in mind is that of Maj. Benjamin Koehler, of the United States Army, who went from Nebraska as a boy to West Point, graduated with honor and a clear record. He went out into the service of the country imbued somewhat with the sentiments that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] thought an American officer ought to have. He carried that idea into his service, both in time of peace and in time of war, in the Philippine insurrection and the Spanish-American War. So gallantly did he lead his men under fire that he was specially commended for bravery and gallantry by Gen. Lawton for service in the Philippines. From there he went into various lines of service, and for his excellent conduct in the different employments which the Government gave him this young man was finally placed in command of Fort Terry, over between Connecticut and Long Island.

There he was in charge of a fort in a place that was most insanitary and in charge of men under him who were most immoral and corrupt—I speak of the underofficers—and in charge of business affairs of that fort which had been most unbusinesslike. This young man was a good disciplinarian, but at the same time the humanity within him had not been eliminated. He went to work, and whereas the officers there had been compelled to wear netting over their faces during the summer to keep out the mosquitoes and to protect themselves from annoyance and disease, he followed the examples of the men who had charge of the Panama Canal construction and cleared that fort of mosquitoes and of mosquito-borne diseases and of conditions that spread disease.

Further than that, he established business methods in and about that fort. He brought the underofficers up to a proper state of discipline and compelled them to observe their legal and financial obligations. More than that, where lewdness and lechery was rife he disciplined the younger officers and at the same time compelled the officers to recognize the rights of men.

The men in their sickness and their misfortunes were ministered to by this young major and those who were under him through his direction. But, as has occurred in other cases in times of peace, these men who were being disciplined, with not sufficient activity on their hands to keep them out of mischief, organized a cabal against him, and having organized that succeeded in having a complaint brought to the War Department, and upon return from a temporary absence he was arrested. He had no intimation or suggestion that there was anything against his record anywhere in the Army.

Charges were preferred against him, and they seemed so unreasonable that their basis was challenged. Friends of the major went to the War Department and requested that the Secretary of War send another man up there to make an investigation and find the truth before court-martialing the major. There in the hearing of two men now on the floor of the House the Secretary of War directed that an officer go up to Fort Terry and make an investigation and either cause a court-martial of the major or a court-martial of the other men, who made the complaint or were interested in it, which involved a large number of the young officers of the fort.

Edmund Burke once said that you could not indict a whole people. Neither could you court-martial a whole fort. So the major was condemned then and there by the then Secretary of War. He made the investigation and brought 17 different specifications. Not one of those charges involved moral turpitude or a crime against the country or against good morals. Where he administered unto the sick and where he had proved himself a humanitarian in looking after the welfare, social and otherwise, of his men his acts were construed into improprieties.

He was finally tried on the 17 specifications, and the two officers most instrumental in bringing the charges against him, one, Lieut. Frick, proved to be a lecherous liar, so much so that numerous witnesses testified that he was not to be believed under oath, and the other leading conspirator who gave testimony, Capt. Worcester, had been disciplined by Maj. Koehler.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman is making a speech outside of the bill, and I have been very lenient so far with him. Can not he extend his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has not made this speech before in the House? There are two sides to Maj. Koehler's case.

Mr. SLOAN. There are not two sides to it.

Mr. GARDNER. I heard the gentleman speak about it before.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska that he have five additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLOAN. He was tried, and notwithstanding the fact that every period of his military record was searched, notwithstanding the fact that every Army officer called upon testified as to his purity of life and character, notwithstanding the fact that no two witnesses testified to any act charged against him, notwithstanding every charge against him was denied by clearest testimony, well corroborated, he was found guilty on 11 specifications. I challenge the gentleman who will read the record, remembering that under the military code an officer charged must be found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, under the same rule as prevails in the criminal law in civil life. not one of these charges was proven with such certainty as would have convicted the vilest man in civil life of the most trivial offense. In one particular case a man testified of a most trivial impropriety taking place in the room in the presence of another major, an officer now connected with the military college here; notwithstanding the statement of these two majors that jury accepted the statement, unsupported by other witnesses, of an uncorroborated statement against the major.

Now, my purpose in discussing this subject, which I have done before——

Mr. GARDNER. I think I can bring to the gentleman's attention where he has brought the case of Maj. Koehler before the House.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, I certainly brought the case to the attention of the House, but I did not make this speech. That is the only particular in which Shakespeare and I are alike—neither of us repeat.

Mr. COX. What was the punishment meted out to the major?

Mr. SLOAN. The punishment meted out was dismissal in dishonor from the Army.

Mr. GARDNER. On what charge?

Mr. SLOAN. On the charge of conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. And what was that conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman of which he was found guilty?

Mr. SLOAN. Slight improprieties.

Mr. GARDNER. Oh!

Mr. SLOAN. Yes. Not a single overt act of moral turpitude or crime was charged against him even in the charge, nor were such charges to have been intended. He was dismissed. We desired to have a hearing before the President of the United States before his sentence was confirmed, and while we understood that we had an arrangement with the Secretary of War whereby we would have an opportunity to appeal to the President of the United States, friends of the major were not advised when the Secretary confirmed the finding of the court-martial and the case was disposed of before the President without the opportunity to present the case to the President, who was probably unaware of any desire to be heard. The sentence was executed and the major was discharged from the service.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Has any Secretary of War agreed with the gentleman's position in this respect—of either party?

Mr. SLOAN. No; because the Secretary who said what I have quoted but recently departed from the service of this Government, and the new Secretary of War has been pretty busily engaged since he was appointed. Further, it is beyond the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War. It rests with Congress, before whom I have filed a bill for the major's reinstatement. But I want to say this, that the substance of the evidence on the 11 specifications upon which he was found guilty was submitted to eminent lawyers in this House and the Senate, and not one of the men, eminent in public life and eminent as lawyers in the Nation, after having read the testimony and charge and considered them, failed to say that there was not sufficient evidence under any of the specifications to find Maj. Koehler guilty. I hope when this appropriation bill has passed the Military Affairs Committee will grant a hearing upon the Maj. Koehler reinstatement bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, may I trespass upon the courtesy of the chairman of the committee for five minutes on another matter? I do not do so very often, but this is a matter about which I feel very deeply. I am not going to offer an amendment to the bill, but I am going to ask the chairman if, during the progress of this bill, and some time before it is enacted into law, he and the party which he represents will not make some provision for the families of the members of the National Guard? Calling a member of the National Guard into the Government service is a very different thing from the case of a volunteer who goes into the Regular Army to make it his vocation. Other governments are doing precisely what I am asking the chairman of the committee to do now. I met a gentleman from Lyon, France, a few days ago. He told me that the men working in the silk mills there had been receiving 4 francs a day, and that when they enlisted and went into the army the Government paid 4 francs a day, which they had been receiving, for the support of their wives and children while they were in the service. The English Government passed a conscription act a few weeks ago and put the married men into a separate class from the single men, and did not send out the call for the married men who had families dependent upon them until the quota of the single men was exhausted. Then they made a provision for the families of the married men while they were in the service. I know that it will be a very great hardship for many of the men who are members of the National Guard to be called away from their usual vocations, and have no compensation except the Army pay of $15 a month. This is a very critical situation for the National Guard.

I do not speak with particular reference to Connecticut, for my understanding is that within 24 hours from the time the call was issued the National Guard in that State announced themselves as ready to submit to the orders of the Government; but I do say this: That it is for your interest and for mine and for the interest of every citizen of this Republic that there should be nothing held back now which will enable the National Guard to gain all of the credit which we all wish for them. The expense of the plan which I propose can not be very great. I do not personally care what the expense is. The people are able and willing to meet the required taxation. I believe that the calling out of the National Guard by the administration at this time is worth all that it will cost, even if they have no war duty to perform, because we will thereby be enabled to judge as to how much dependence can be placed upon them, and I want to place implicit reliance and dependence upon them, and I want to encourage them all, single men and married men—but married men especially with families, having responsibilities upon them—and I think the Government ought in some way provide for them under existing conditions. I want most earnestly to ask the chairman if at some time during the progress of the passage of this bill he himself will not offer an amendment making some additional provision for the care of the families of the men of the National Guard who are suddenly taken away from their usual vocations? I do not want to hear of one soldier's family anywhere in this land being found dependent upon local charity while he is away from his home defending the country's flag. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For amount required to make monthly payments to Jennie Carroll, widow of James Carroll, late major, United States Army, $1,500.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order to this provision.

Mr. HAY. It is not subject to a point of order. There was a special act passed giving this pension, or whatever you may call it, to Mrs. Carroll, and it has been carried in this bill ever since the law was passed, some eight or nine years ago. Therefore it is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama controvert what the gentleman from Virginia says? If not, it is plainly not subject to the point of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say this: This is an appropriation to pay a pension to a widow of a soldier.

Mr. HAY. It is not a pension.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to know what it is.

Mr. HAY. I can state to the gentleman what it is. This is to pay the amount of $1,500 a year in monthly payments to Jennie Carroll, widow of James Carroll, late a major in the United States Army. Maj. Carroll was a surgeon who made experiments in Cuba about yellow fever on his own body, and the Congress of the United States thought it was as little as it could do to provide for his widow, and the Congress passed a special act making provision for her in this way. It has been carried on this bill ever since the law was passed.

Mr. MANN. May 23, 1908.

Mr. HAY. May 23, 1908.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that this is a pension, and that it was granted by special statute and that it is an appropriation for the purpose of paying a pension. As such it comes within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Military Affairs has no right to report an appropriation for anything except for the upkeep of the Army. I will ask the indulgence of the chairman, so I may read a portion of Rule XI, under which jurisdiction is conferred upon committees:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule as follows, viz: Subjects relating:

Third. For appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz, for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions; and for all deficiencies; to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now section 12:

To the Military Establishment, the militia, and the public defense, including the appropriations for their support, and for that of the Military Academy; to the committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Chairman, originally the Committee on Military Affairs did not have jurisdiction to report an appropriation bill at all. The rule was amended in 1885, as it appears here, giving to that committee the power to report appropriation bills for the support of the Military Academy and the support of the Military Establishment, but never has jurisdiction been given to that committee to report an appropriation to pay a pension or a gratuity or a reward, whatever it may be called, whatever the gentleman may choose to call this payment that is proposed to be made to this no doubt very worthy object.

The CHAIRMAN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. That same reason would apply to the provisions of line 15:

For one year's pay to beneficiaries of officers and enlisted men who die as a result of aviation accident.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would not like to express an opinion on that, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me it is possible that it might, but it is not so clear that it does. However, it is absolutely clear to my mind that this appropriation does not come within the scope of the provision of subsection 12. It is not for a part of the Military Establishment, it is not for maintaining it. It is not for maintaining the militia, it is not for the public defense, it is not for the Military Academy. It is not for either of those four things. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to get this question of order mixed up with the merits of the appropriation. We have a great many very meritorious appropriations——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will only look at it from its parliamentary standpoint.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If we waive the argument which the gentleman had made on that point, I insist that if it is worthy it should come in under the report of the Committee on Appropriations making their recommendation therefor. It seems to me we can not carry on our legislation in an orderly way unless we pursue that general policy.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the point of order of the gentleman from Alabama is well taken. The point of order has been made before to this item, and has been overruled by the Chair—I forget who occupied it; I am not sure it was not the present occupant of the chair, but here is an appropriation made to carry out the law——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does it differ in that respect from any other private pension legislation?

Mr. HAY. It is not a pension; it is a provision made for the support of the widow of an officer of the Army, and it is not a pension and it is given for unusual reasons. Now, the gentleman says you must discriminate between points of order and the merits of the case. That may be, but if the gentleman and the Congress want the officers of the Army and the Navy to properly defend the country and be willing to give their lives up in the interest of the country and in the interest of humanity, I do not believe in this picking out points of order for cases of this kind, for there never was a more meritorious case than this. I do not believe it is subject to a point of order, because if it is not in order on this bill it must be in order on some bill. What other bill? It is no more in order on the legislative bill than it is on this bill or the sundry civil bill or on any other appropriation bill. It has been in order on this bill all the time. It has been decided to be in order on this bill, and I do not see any reason why it should not be carried on this bill, as it has been done ever since it was authorized.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In what respect does this differ so far as this question is concerned from any other pension? A pension is a gratuity paid periodically by the Government for worthy services rendered. Now, how does this differ from any other pension in that respect?

Mr. HAY. It differs from it in the amount; it differs in the way in which it was granted; it differs from it in that it is not a pension in the sense we generally regard a pension.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is not a pension. It is a special act authorizing the payment to the widow of James Carroll, which same act provided for the same sum to be paid to the widow of Jesse W. Lazear. It was a special act, a special provision, not a pension to this widow. It does not come within the scope of a pension, and did not come from the Pension Committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, when I happened to be a member of the Commitee on Pensions, these bills were referred to that committee for both of these cases. Pending their discussion they were taken from the Committee on Pensions, and I think jurisdiction was taken by the Committee on Military Affairs. At least, the Committee on Pensions did not pass upon these bills, because of the precedent that it would have established in that committee, and I think jurisdiction was taken by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Does the mere fact that the Committee on Military Affairs reported a bill granting this gratuity, or whatever you choose to call it, affect the question as to what appropriation bill should carry it?

Mr. CAMPBELL. But the point is that it was not regarded as a pension, but as a special recognition by the Government of the United States of unusual service rendered by these officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of jurisdiction is frequently technical and hairsplitting, and sometimes you can with almost equal logic refer a matter to either one of two committees. Accepting the statement of facts made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], this matter was originally disposed of by the Committee on Military Affairs; and while, of course, in a sense, if you ran this thing down to the ultimate, it may be a pension; yet in another sense it is related to the Military Establishment. Having in mind the genesis and origin of the matter, it seems to the Chair very clear that this ought to remain with the Committee on Military Affairs and in this bill. Yet a very good argument might be made in favor of the contention of the gentleman from Alabama.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the same point of order as to the next item in the bill, beginning with line 23, on page 16, and ending with line 25, the appropriation for Mable H. Lazear, which is in the same situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks on the same principle it must be perfectly clear that if this item is to go out a number of these items here relating to the Military Establishment must go out of the bill. The item on the top of page 17 would come within the principle of the ruling, if the point of order is sustained; but it seems to the Chair that all these matters are sufficiently related to the Military Establishment to be included in this bill, and the point of order is overruled.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will say to the Chair that I make this point of order knowing that it is the same as the other one, but not wishing to discriminate between these items, because I make no choice between them.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will pardon me, the item on page 17 differs very materially from the other. Mr. Kissinger is now living. He offered himself on the call for volunteers to experiment as to the origin of yellow fever and the discovery of the yellow-fever germ. He offered himself as a sacrifice, and was ruined by it. After that he went into the Hospital Corps, and still lives, but is a hopeless cripple. It was a contribution to science, a very different matter. But few instances are on record of such sacrifice as he made in the interest of science and humanity. He was a fine specimen of physical and mental manhood. When the call came for some one to offer himself for the experiment, he responded to the call, science and humanity profited, but he was ruined for life, made a hopeless cripple, and will so remain as long as he lives. It was on his part a heroic service, and this is a very small sum to pay him. It ought to be more than double the amount here allowed.

Mr. HAY. It is just exactly the same as the other two items. All three of these men did the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is sufficient to justify their retention in this bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the rolls of the War Department the name of Harriett Chiverton Carroll, mother of the late James Carroll, major and surgeon, United States Army, and pay her for and during the period of her natural life, in lieu of all pensions, the sum of $50 per month, in special recognition of the eminent services of said James Carroll in discovering the means of preventing, as well as the cause and method of transmission and propagation of, yellow fever, and demonstrating on his own person the truth of the theory of the transmission and propagation of yellow-fever infection by mosquitoes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that, and the additional point that it is new legislation.

Mr. HAY. It is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Insert as a new paragraph, after line 16, on page 17, the following:

"That the Secretary of War shall make a list of all officers of the Army who have been placed on the retired list for disability, and shall cause such officers to be examined at intervals as may be advisable, and such officers as shall be found to have recovered from such disability or to be able to perform services of value to the Government sufficient to warrant such action shall be assigned to such duty as the Secretary of War may approve."

Mr. HAY. I think that amendment ought to be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

All the money hereinbefore appropriated for pay of the Army and miscellaneous, except the appropriation for mileage of officers, pay clerks, acting dental surgeons, contract surgeons, and expert accountant, Inspector General's Department, when authorized by law, shall be disbursed and accounted for by officers of the Quartermaster Corps as pay of the Army, and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. HAY. I move to amend the bill, on page 18, line 6, by striking out the words "acting dental surgeons." I do that because they have now become commissioned officers, and it is not necessary that they be carried in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16460) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 114) withholding from allotment the unallotted lands or public domain of the Creek Nation or Tribe of Indians and providing for the sale thereof, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BRUCKNER, indefinitely, on account of illness.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill (H. R. 13383), disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 13383, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I believe this bill just came over to-day. Would the gentleman have any objection to letting his request lie over until to-morrow?

Mr. FLOOD. It will just defer it that much longer, that is all.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. STAFFORD. At the present time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

SCHOONER LEDGE RANGE FRONT LIGHT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 20, 1916.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to return to the House of Representatives, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. 13233) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to exchange lands belonging to the United States at the mouth of Crum River, Pa., for other lands adjacent thereto, for the purpose of removing thereto the Schooner Ledge Range Front Light, so that it may be on the range of the channel of the Delaware River, and further authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to remove said range light from its present location to the property acquired by the exchange.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to vacate all the proceedings by which this bill was ordered to a third reading and passed, and that the bill lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to vacate all the proceedings on this bill back to the point where the third reading was ordered, and that the bill lie on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 22, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Gravesend Bay, N. Y., with a view to the construction of a breakwater (H. Doc. No. 1230); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of Harbor City, Tex., to a connection with the inland waterway (H. Doc. No. 1231); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and a resolution were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16093) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 824), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CARAWAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 239) to establish a new judicial circuit of the United States with a circuit court of appeals, hereafter to be called the tenth circuit, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 825), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16287) granting the consent of Congress to the county of Sumter, or to the county of Dooly, both of the State of Georgia, acting jointly or separately, and their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Flint River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 836), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLOOD, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 12) requesting the President of the United States to designate a day on which funds may be raised for the relief of the Armenians, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 837), which said concurrent resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 22, 1916.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee for Thy guidance and blessing in a troublous time. In the midst of the first rude conflict, a time that tests the great moral and spiritual ideals of the Nation, we turn back to the God of our fathers and seek Thy favor. We know that it will profit us nothing if we as a Nation gain the whole world and lose our own soul. To Thy hand we commit our interests. As Thou hast guided us in the years past ever onward and upward in the achievement of the purposes of our civil organization, so we pray that Thou wilt guide us still. At this time may we not allow ourselves either in the vanity of power or in the conceit of safety to rest secure, but grant, we pray, that in all diligence we may give ourselves to the seeking of those lines of peace and justice and righteousness that exalt a nation and that will give us even larger influence among the nations of the world. May we show ourselves a self-mastered people. To this end do Thou guide us by Thy holy spirit. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, June 20, 1916, when, on request of Mr. SWANSON, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13383) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLOOD, Mr. CLINE, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Keene, Tex., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Fenimore Council, No. 249, United Commercial Travelers of America, of Mitchell, S. Dak., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide an investigation into conditions surrounding the marketing of dairy products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Dakota, praying for an increase in armaments, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Worthing, S. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of Local Branch No. 6, Post Office Clerks' Association, of Chicago, Ill., remonstrating against the transfer of temporary employees in the Auditor's Office of the Post Office Department to the money-order division of the Chicago post office, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a memorial of the Board of Supervisors of Butte County, Cal., remonstrating against the imposition of a Federal tax on inheritances, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Health Officers' Association of Los Angeles County, Cal., praying for Federal aid in the treatment of tuberculosis, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of San Joaquin County, Cal., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Franklin Printing Trades Association, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of manufactured papers and materials used in the making of paper, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Great Falls, Helena, and Miles City, in the State of Montana, praying for Federal censorship of motion pictures, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Helena and Miles City, in the State of Montana, praying for the enactment of legislation to forbid interstate transmission of race-gambling odds and bets, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club, of Great Falls, Mont., praying for Federal aid in the construction of good roads, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Wyoming, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of Washington relating to legislation for the relief of settlers on unsurveyed Northern Pacific Railway lands, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
The State of Washington, Department of State.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, I. M. Howell, secretary of state of the State of Washington and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of senate joint memorial No. 1, passed January 18 and 19, 1915, with the original copy of said memorial now on file in this office, and find the same to be a full, true, and correct copy of said original and of the whole thereof, together with all official indorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Washington. Done at the capitol, at Olympia, this 24th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.] I. M. HOWELL,
Secretary of State.
By J. GRANT HINKLE,
Assistant Secretary of State.

(Senate joint memorial 1.)

To the Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, would most respectfully represent:

That the Hon. A. A. Jones, First Assistant Secretary of the Interior, on December 13, 1913, in submitting his report to the Senate Committee on Public Lands on Senate bills Nos. 2801 and 3087, made the following recommendation:

"I recommend the amendment of the act of July 1, 1898 (30 Stat., 597), extending the right of selection to settlement claims arising prior to July 1, 1913."

That there are pending at this time in the United States Senate certain bills looking for the relief of settlers on Northern Pacific Railway lands, on which bills the Senate Committee on Public Lands has requested a report from the Interior Department.

Therefore, we, your memorialists, most earnestly and respectfully pray that your honorable department submit its further report regarding a proposed amendment of the act of July 1, 1898, extending relief to settlers whose settlement claims were prior to July 1, 1913, causing to be introduced in Congress legislation in conformity with its report, if it should be ascertained that such legislation be not already pending.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Passed the senate January 18, 1915.

LOUIS F. HART,
President of the Senate.

Passed the house January 19, 1915.

W. W. CONNER,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented the memorial of Carolyn Davis and sundry other citizens of Seattle, Wash., and the memorial of Mrs. George Woolf and sundry other citizens of Colville, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented the memorial of Willard Fay and sundry other citizens of Colville, Wash., and the memorial of Mary A. W. Paxton and sundry other citizens of Hassan, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Alpena, Mich., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented petitions of sundry citizens of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New Bedford and Fairhaven, in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to limit the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

CONSTRUCTION OF SUBMARINES.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 13670) amending an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes," relating to the authorization of fleet submarines, and I submit a report (No. 526) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER. I should like to hear the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provision of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes," which reads as follows: "Two submarines, to be of seagoing type, to have a surface speed of 25 knots or more if possible, but not less than 20 knots, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $1,500,000 each," is hereby amended to read as follows: "Two submarines, to be of seagoing type, to have a surface speed of 25 knots or more if possible, but not less than 19 knots, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $1,500,000 each."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 348) to establish the Lassen Volcanic National Park in the Sierra Nevada Mountains in the State of California, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 536) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 5612) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 535) thereon.

BENJAMIN F. ROBINSON AND JOHN DOWS.

Mr. MYERS. On the 20th day of this month the bill (H. R. 11286) for the issuance of a patent for certain Government land to Benjamin F. Robinson and John Dows was read the first and second times and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I report it back favorably.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be issued to Benjamin F. Robinson and John Dows a patent for lots 8, 9, 10, and 11, in section 22, township 99 north, range 32 west of the fifth principal meridian, Iowa: Provided, That within three months after the passage of this act they shall have presented their application therefor and made payment for said tracts at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any other person or persons which may have attached to the land or to any part thereof.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a similar Senate bill, which was passed by the Senate. There is no difference whatever between the Senate bill and the House bill, save by a mistake the House passed the House bill instead of the Senate bill, and on the floor a very trifling amendment was made substituting for the words "approval hereof" the words "passage of this act." I therefore ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill now reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN PORT ANGELES, WASH.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5900) providing for the disposal of certain lands in block 69, in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington, and I submit a report (No. 533) thereon.

Mr. JONES. That is a very short bill, and as it is purely local I ask that it may have immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It grants to the city of Port Angeles, in the State of Washington, for municipal purposes, lots 1 and 2, 17 and 18, in block 69, and authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to the proper city authorities for said lots, conditioned that the same shall be used for municipal purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND IN ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 3699) to donate to the city of St. Augustine, Fla., for park purposes, the tract of land known as the powder-house lot, and I submit a report (No. 532) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I ask that the bill be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the tract of land situate in the city of St. Augustine, Fla., known as the powder-house lot, heretofore set aside as a military reservation of the United States, and lately abandoned as such military reservation, be, and same is hereby, donated to the municipality of the said city of St. Augustine, in the State of Florida, to be used by said municipality for public-park purposes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to execute and deliver to the duly constituted authorities of the said city of St. Augustine, Fla., such conveyances as may be necessary to vest the fee-simple title to said powder-house lot in the said city of St. Augustine, Fla., attaching to such conveyances the condition that whenever the said powder-house lot shall cease to be used by the city for public-park purposes, then and in that event title to the said powder-house lot shall revert to the Government of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN STATES LUMBER CO.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5439) for the relief of the Southern States Lumber Co., and I submit a report (No. 534) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes to the calendar.

RED RIVER BRIDGE, OKLAHOMA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7613) to authorize the Terral Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Red River near Terral, Jefferson County, Okla., and I submit a report (No. 528) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DIXIE HIGHWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 6242) authorizing the counties of Nassau, Fla., and Charlton, Ga., to construct a bridge across the St. Marys River between Florida and Georgia, and I submit a report (No. 527) thereon. I ask for the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 6, before the words "Kolars Ferry," to insert "a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near," and in the same line to strike out the words "a point," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the counties of Nassau, Fla., and Charlton, Ga., to build, maintain, and operate a bridge across the waters of the St. Marys River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Kolars Ferry, about 2 miles below the Atlantic Coast Line Railway bridge, between the States of Florida and Georgia, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WABASH RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 13669) to authorize the county of Wabash, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River, at the city of Wabash, Ind., and I submit a report (No. 529) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GRAND CALUMET RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15007) to authorize the board of commissioners of Lake County, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River, in the State of Indiana, and I submit a report (No. 531) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15006) to authorize the board of commissioners of Lake County, Ind., to construct a bridge across the Grand Calumet River, in the State of Indiana, and I submit a report (No. 530) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXPERIMENTS IN DRY-LAND AGRICULTURE.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 393) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes. A similar bill has already passed the Senate, being Senate bill 592. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if the bill has been referred to the committee.

Mr. STERLING. It has been referred to the Public Lands Committee, and I have been authorized to report it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill be read so that we may see what it is.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

Mr. STERLING. It is identically the same as Senate bill 592, which was reported favorably and which has passed the Senate. House bill 393 was also referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I now report it back.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read. I think it is all right, but we ought to see what it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon receipt of a proper deed from the State of North Dakota, executed under authority of the act of its legislative assembly approved February 5, 1915, reconveying to the United States title to section 16, township 138 north, range 81 west, fifth principal meridian, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to issue patents to said State for such vacant, surveyed, unreserved, unoccupied, nonmineral public lands as may be selected by said State within its boundaries, not exceeding 1,280 acres in aggregate area; and said section when so reconveyed shall not be subject to settlement, location, entry, or selection under the public-land laws, but shall be reserved for the use of the Department of Agriculture in carrying on experiments in dry-land agriculture at the Northern Great Plains Field Station, Mandan, N. Dak.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HITCHCOCK:

A bill (S. 6415) providing for the classification of salaries of veterinary inspectors and lay inspectors (grades 1 and 2) employed in the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 6416) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to lease certain property.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is the bill just introduced by the Senator from California for the purpose of authorizing one of the departments of the Government to lease certain lands?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of Commerce to lease, at his discretion, for a period not exceeding 25 years, such unoccupied and unproductive property of the United States under his control for the leasing of which there is no authority under existing law, and such leases shall be reported annually to Congress.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the subject matter of that bill is under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, and it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I therefore ask that it be so referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 6441) granting a pension to Laura J. Grant (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $700,000 to construct and equip two steam Coast Guard cutters for service on the Pacific coast and the Alaskan waters, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 15947), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $60,000 for the payment of transportation of teams authorized by the Secretary of War to participate in the national matches, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 16460), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $300,000 to establish and maintain indoor and outdoor rifle ranges for the use of all able-bodied males capable of bearing arms, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 16460), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of War to cause to be made a survey to determine the causes of erosions taking place on the southern side of Galveston Island, Tex., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the fortifications appropriation bill (H. R. 14303), which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 out of the appropriation for the eradication of the foot-and-mouth and other contagious diseases of animals so as to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to ascertain and pay the loss caused George P. Frederick, of Newport, Del., resulting from disinfecting his premises by Government inspectors during the outbreak of the foot-and-mouth disease during the fall of 1914, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 12717), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $18,000 for the salaries of nine stenographic clerks for the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 15836), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. JONES. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to Senate resolution 195, to amend the standing rules of the Senate relative to closing debate in the Senate. I ask that the amendment lie on the table and be printed, and that it also be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, and also to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike out all after the words "Provided, however" and insert the following:

"That if 16 Senators, after a measure has continued the unfinished business of the Senate during one calendar week, present to the Senate a signed motion to bring to a close the debate upon such measure, the presiding officer shall at once state the motion to the Senate, and at the close of the morning hour on the following calendar day lay the motion before the Senate and direct that the Secretary call the roll, and, upon the ascertainment that a quorum is present, the Chair shall, without debate, submit to the Senate by an aye-and-nay vote the question:

"'Is it the sense of the Senate that the debate shall be brought to a close?'

"And if that question shall be decided in the affirmative by a two-thirds vote of those present as determined by the vote and announcement of pairs, then said measure shall be in order to the exclusion of all other business, except what may be taken up by unanimous consent, and except a motion to recess or adjourn.

"Thereafter no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be entitled to speak more than one hour on the bill, nor more than 10 minutes on any amendment thereto or motion affecting the same, and it shall be the duty of the Chair to keep the time of each Senator who speaks. All points of order and appeals from the decisions of the Chair shall be decided without debate."

WAGES OF RAILROAD EMPLOYEES.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 145) to investigate wage conditions on railroads, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the controversy that has arisen between the railroads and certain of their employees relating to a shortening of the hours of labor without corresponding decrease in pay, and for increased compensation for any service performed in excess of the daily period prescribed, may lead to a serious interruption of the railroad service, with disastrous effect upon the public welfare and upon the commerce of the Nation: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed immediately to investigate and to report to the Congress as soon as practicable the minimum, maximum, and average wage paid, with hours of service, to each class of railroad employees in the United States, and, so far as they are comparable, the minimum, maximum, and average wage, with hours of service, paid in other industries where similar skill and risk are involved, the relation of wages to railroad revenues, the question of whether railroad revenues based on existing rates for transportation will admit of equally favorable terms to all classes of railroad employees, and any other matter in this connection that the commission may deem relevant; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress that the railway companies, their officers and employees, should give their hearty support and cooperation to the Interstate Commerce Commission in its investigation, deferring pending controversies over questions at issue until that commission may be able to complete its investigations and make its report to the Congress.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement.

The joint resolution which I have offered provides in brief that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall proceed immediately to investigate and report to Congress upon the minimum, maximum, and average wage paid, with hours of service, to each class of railroad employees in the United States, and, so far as they are comparable, the minimum, maximum, and average wage, with hours of service, paid in other industries where similar skill and risk are involved, the relation of wages to railroad revenues, the question whether railroad revenues, based on existing rates for transportation, will admit of equally favorable terms to all classes of railroad employees, and any other matter that the commission may deem relevant.

In form it originates with a committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, composed of 12 members, which has been making a study of the railroad situation, under instructions received from the annual meeting of the national chamber last February. The resolution in this form has been submitted to a referendum vote of all the commercial bodies in the United States affiliated with the national chamber. It has been indorsed by the largest vote that has been cast on any referendum. Three hundred and sixty-six organizations, situated in 43 States, the District of Columbia, and Hawaii, filed ballots. At the end of the forty-fifth day allowed for consideration the result was 987¾ votes in favor and 29¼ votes against, each organization being allowed from 1 to 10 votes, according to the number of its members.

I ask leave to insert in the RECORD the referendum pamphlet containing the report of the committee, the arguments for and against the resolution, and the ballot, which were sent to each organization to vote upon, and also a bulletin, dated June 16, giving the result of the vote and the actual vote of every organization that took part in the balloting, arranged by States and cities.

On March 29, 1916, the four brotherhoods, comprising all the men employed on moving trains, presented their demands for an eight-hour day and pay at the rate of time and a half for overtime. Before the usual 30 days had expired, the brotherhoods requested a conference with the railroad managers, which took place in New York beginning June 1. One week ago the conference came to an abrupt close when the railroad operators, in reply to a question of the brotherhoods as to whether they would accede to the demands, refused to do so. The brotherhoods are now engaged in taking a strike vote, which, when accomplished, within a period of four to six weeks, if favorable, will grant to the four leaders the power, in their discretion, to call a strike.

The resolution is drawn from the point of view of the public as an interested party in the controversy. It would be difficult to exaggerate the calamity that would result from a tie-up of freight of all the railroads of the United States in one week. No legislation exists on the statute books for preventing such a calamity should either party refuse to submit to arbitration. Neither can maintain its position, if, when the facts are presented, public opinion based on these facts is against it. It is with a view to ascertaining a just conclusion through a nonpartisan quasi judicial body which has the necessary facilities for doing the work expeditiously that this resolution is introduced.

I ask that the matter referred to be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have tried very hard to hear all that the Senator said, but was unable to do so on account of the confusion. What is the matter which the chamber of commerce voted on?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The matter that the chamber of commerce voted on was whether Congress should be called upon to act upon a certain resolution presented to the various chambers of commerce and boards of trade throughout the United States, which resolution I have just offered. That resolution provides for an inquiry. Does the Senator wish me to state the resolution itself, or did he hear it?

Mr. REED. No; I did not hear it. The substance of it is all I want.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, the substance of the resolution is that the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed immediately to investigate and report to Congress as soon as practicable the minimum, maximum, and average wage paid, with hours of service, to each class of railroad employees in the United States, and, so far as they are comparable, the minimum, maximum, and average wage, with hours of service, paid in other industries where similar skill and risk are involved; the relation of wages to railroad revenues; the question of whether railroad revenues based on existing rates for transportation will admit of equally favorable terms to all classes of railroad employees; and any other matter in this connection that the commission may deem relevant.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Interstate Commerce Commission making that kind of a report, but I understand the Senator wants to introduce into the RECORD the entire proceedings of the New York Chamber of Commerce——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Not the New York Chamber of Commerce. This is the National Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America.

Mr. REED. Together with the literature which they sent out and the votes of each of the subsidiary organizations. Is that the document the Senator has in his hand?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; it is the document.

Mr. REED. It is about as large as a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in itself, is it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no; it is a document of about 10 pages only and in very large print. It will not take much space, and I think it is simply a fair statement, so far as I have read it, of both sides of the controversy, without any attempt to take sides regarding it.

Mr. REED. A fair statement of both sides of the controversy made by the chamber of commerce?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; made by the committee of twelve, which has been engaged in investigating the matter for some time.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that to put in the arguments sent out by a committee of that kind and to put in the votes in detail would be to cumber the RECORD unnecessarily. It would be on a par with putting into the RECORD something that the Federation of Labor might send out and then putting in the action of each labor organization, which would take a vast amount of space. The original action of either one of these bodies might be proper, but the detailed vote, it seems to me, is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to object to the Senator's proposition, but it seems to me——

Mr. NEWLANDS. I can not imagine anything that is objectionable in this, and I state that I think it will be informative. So far as I am concerned, I should be very glad to see any action of the labor organizations themselves——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is the request of the Senator from Nevada to have the resolution submitted to the Senate now.

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I do not ask that the resolution be submitted to the Senate now. I ask that it be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. All that I ask is that this memorandum may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the insertion in the RECORD of the document referred to by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada what is the purpose of having it inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. OLIVER. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, Mr. President, I move that this matter be printed in the RECORD. It is some 10 pages in length.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to have the Senator from Nevada answer my question.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will do so. I will state what this pamphlet consists of.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is not this debate out of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of order, then, that it is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But there is no way in which the Chair can stop it when Senators will not stop speaking at the request of the Chair.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it out of order for me to reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Mississippi?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole debate, after there was an objection, has been out of order.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Would it be in order for me to move that this matter be inserted in the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that there is no way to move to put anything into the RECORD. It either goes in by unanimous consent, or, at an appropriate time, the Senator must read it into the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the interest of getting this matter cleared up, does the Chair understand that I made an objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No. The objection was to the further continuance of the discussion and a demand for the regular order.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] objected.

PRICE OF ANTHRACITE COAL.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 217) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, requested to make an immediate investigation into the operations and accounts of the leading companies producing anthracite coal, for the purpose of ascertaining the facts concerning the recent increase in the price of anthracite coal, and report the same to the Senate during the present session of Congress, if possible.

Resolved. That the commission be requested to include in its report a showing of the relation between the cost of labor and the price of anthracite coal prior to said increase and at the present time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning the Senate, on my motion, adopted a resolution requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make a certain investigation of the prices of anthracite coal. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, immediately following the resolution, certain correspondence between the Federal Trade Commission and the Attorney General and the report of a telephone conversation following the last letter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1916.

The FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: It has been stated in the public press, with apparent authority, that having agreed to an advance in wages the railroad coal companies will now use that as an excuse for materially increasing the price of anthracite coal to consumers

It has been brought out in the various legal proceedings against the anthracite railroads that on similar occasions in the past when wages have been advanced the railroad coal companies, on the pretext of increasing prices for the purpose of meeting the increased cost of production resulting from the higher wages, have made much greater increases than were necessary for that purpose.

Since January 1, 1900, there have been three general advances in the wages of mine workers in the anthracite regions, exclusive of the present advance.

In October, 1900, wages were advanced approximately 10 per cent. In the fiscal year immediately preceding this advance (July 1, 1899–June 30, 1900) the cost of production of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., whose mines are amongst the most expensive to operate, was $1.67 per ton. In the fiscal year immediately following (July 1, 1900–June 30, 1901) its cost of production was $1.826 per ton, an increase of $0.156 per ton, which includes not only the increase due to the advance in wages but the increase due to all other factors. On the other hand, the same company (the others following suit) increased prices by $0.232 per ton on all sizes, making the excess of price increase over cost increase $0.076 per ton.

On November 1, 1902, there was another general advance in wages of approximately 14 per cent. In the fiscal year immediately preceding this advance (July 1, 1901–June 30, 1902) the cost of production of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. was $2.066 per ton. In the fiscal year immediately following (July 1, 1902–June 30, 1903) its cost of production was $2.199 per ton, an increase of $0.133 per ton, which includes not only the increase due to the advance in wages but the increase due to all other factors. On the other hand, the same company (the others following) increased prices by $0.494 per ton on all sizes, making the excess of price increase over cost increase $0.363 per ton.

Undoubtedly the prices immediately following the wage increase in 1902 were abnormally high, due to the scarcity of coal in consequence of the long strike. It will be fairer, therefore, to take the prices prevailing in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1904, as the basis for comparison. This would show an excess of price increase over cost increase of $0.245 per ton

In 1912 another advance in wages took place, amounting to about 5.6 per cent net. Again prices were increased on the pretext of meeting the resulting increase in the cost of production. On this occasion the House of Representatives directed the Bureau of Labor to make an investigation. The bureau found that whereas the advanced wages increased the cost of production only $0.09 per ton, prices were increased $0.25 per ton, making the disparity between price increase and cost increase $0.16 per ton.

The report of the Bureau of Labor states:

"Following the agreement of May 20, 1912, the wholesale price of anthracite coal was advanced by the mining companies about 25 cents per ton when all sizes are taken into consideration. The advance in miners' wages under the above agreement and the increase in wages granted to men not specifically covered by the agreement was equivalent to an increase of between 8 and 10 cents per ton in the cost of labor, or an average increase of about 9 cents per ton for the anthracite region as a whole. Deducting this increase in labor cost from the increase in the selling price per ton, it will be seen that the prices realized by the coal-mining companies were increased about 16 cents per ton more than was required by the new scale of wages alone." (H. Doc. No. 1442, p. 33.)

As the total consumption for some years past has been in the neighborhood of 75,000,000 tons, this excess of price increase over cost increase following the advance in wages in 1912 meant a surtax upon consumers of about $12,000,000 annually.

In view of these facts, I take the liberty of suggesting that if the advance in wages just agreed upon shall be followed, as in the past, by an increase in the price of coal to consumers the Federal Trade Commission, under the authority of section 6 of the act creating it, institute a searching investigation into the operations and accounts of the great producing companies for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts upon which such increase in price may be based, including the relation between any increase in the cost of production due to advance of wages and the increase of profits caused by the increase in price.

Very truly, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

MAY 9, 1916.

Hon. THOMAS W. GREGORY,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The commission has given careful consideration to your letter of May 6 pertaining to the anthracite-coal industry.

If the situation should develop as you suggest, the commission will be glad to take the matter up with you further, with a view to making such investigation as the public interest may require.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully, BRACKEN, Secretary.

An inquiry at the office of the Federal Trade Commission is answered by the information that since the above correspondence, about June 1, wages were increased about 12 cents per ton and the wholesale price of coal about 30 cents per ton.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, on the 14th of January last I introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) authorizing intervention in the Republic of Mexico. That has been now something over five months ago. The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. In view of the inquiry which I desire to make in respect to it, and in order to refresh the memory of the Senate, I should like to have the joint resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78) authorizing intervention in the Republic of Mexico was read as follows:

Whereas the Republic of Mexico is and has been for a long time without a government, and as a consequence her territory has been devastated, her laws set at defiance, her people robbed, murdered, and driven from their homes and their property destroyed; and

Whereas American citizens residing and sojourning in Mexico have been murdered and robbed, their wives and daughters outraged, and their property confiscated and destroyed; and

Whereas our people have no protection from any power or authority in Mexico and none from their own country; and

Whereas it is the duty of this Government to protect its citizens in their lives, their liberty, and their property at home and abroad: Now therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to intervene in the Republic of Mexico for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens residing and sojourning therein and for the establishment and maintenance, as long as it may be necessary, of a stable government in Mexico, adequate for the protection of the lives, the liberty, the independence, and the property of its people.

Second. That the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to use the Army and Navy forces, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the objects and purposes above set forth.

Third. That when a stable and efficient government is firmly established in Mexico, adequate for the protection of its people in their rights, and of citizens and subjects of foreign nations therein, it shall be the duty of the President and of Congress to withdraw and surrender such government to the people of Mexico upon such conditions and under such guaranties of continued protection to American citizens and citizens and subjects of other nations residing or sojourning therein as are just and reasonable.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have been content up to this time to allow this joint resolution to remain in the Committee on Foreign Relations without action. It seems to me, however, that the time has now come when this matter should not be left to action by the Executive Department of the Government, but that some action should be taken by Congress. I think it is exceedingly important, if we are forced to enter Mexico, that we should do it under a declaration of Congress as to what the purpose of going into that country is, and what our intentions are; so that not only the people of our own country, but the people of other nations may know and understand what the purpose and the object of the United States are in taking this very important step.

My purpose in bringing the matter before the Senate this morning is to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. STONE] as to what action has been taken by the committee upon the joint resolution, and what may be expected in the near future?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations have not taken any action on the joint resolution. It is still before the committee. It has not been reached in the course of its business in a way that the committee felt that any affirmative action should be taken; at least none has been taken. What the committee may do with the joint resolution I am not prepared to say.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I did not call up this matter this morning with any intention of precipitating debate about it. It seemed to me, however, that we have reached a point in our relations with Mexico when something should be done by Congress.

It was intimated—I do not know whether or not it is true—that the President intended to address Congress on the subject. I have no official notification of that fact. I had determined to present the matter in this way before having that intimation. It may be that the President will come before Congress, and then we may act more intelligently respecting the matter.

I myself feel very strongly that the conditions in Mexico are such that we can not justly delay this matter longer. I want now, in connection with my remarks, to submit what I said at the time I introduced this resolution, which was very brief, explaining my views on the subject. I did not want to take up time in repeating what I then said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the merits of the resolution I have offered at this time. I only want to say that up to this time the whole responsibility of dealing with the Mexican situation has been allowed to rest upon the President. It is a grave responsibility. He has been severely criticized for his policy of watchful waiting. I think we have all sympathized with the President in his hope that conditions in Mexico would right themselves without forcible interference on our part. I very much fear that that hope no longer has any foundation to rest upon.

"Congress alone has power to declare war, and that is what intervention in Mexico means. Therefore Congress should courageously assume responsibility for whatever is to be done in that unfortunate country, and not leave it to rest upon the Executive Department of the Government.

"I have offered the resolution in such form as to present the direct issue involved. There is no reason why we should seek to divide the responsibility with any other country or impose it upon the President. It is our responsibility, and we should meet it calmly and courageously, and that without delay.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. President, I assume entire responsibility for the resolution that I have offered. The Republican Party is not responsible for it. Not a single Senator on this side of the Chamber except myself is responsible, directly or indirectly, for the resolution that has been offered. I join in the hope expressed by the Senator from Missouri that this question may not be made a political one.

"The resolution was not offered with any idea or intention of criticizing the conduct of the President in dealing with this grave and important question. I think it is unfair to the President that Congress should sit idly by and do nothing more than to criticize the course of the President, because I think the responsibility rests upon us and not upon the President of the United States.

"Something should be done in this emergency by somebody to relieve the situation as it exists to-day. American citizens are losing their lives in Mexico day after day as the result of the conditions that prevail there. If Congress comes to the conclusion that we should leave matters as they are without affording protection of any kind to our citizens in that country, well and good. If, on the other hand, it should be believed by Congress that steps should be taken, even to the extent of intervention, to protect our citizens in Mexico, then I think it is a matter that Congress should deal with and not the President.

"I have been one of those who have been exceedingly reluctant to take strong measures in dealing with affairs in Mexico. I have sympathized very much with the view of the President that we should resort to all proper means in advance to prevent intervention or war, but I must confess that I see no hope ahead of us at this time except through that means. If other Senators, if Congress, can find some better means of protecting our citizens in Mexico than that of resorting to force, and that shall be successful, nobody will be more gratified than myself; but my position about it is this: We have been talking about this question and agitating it day after day since Congress met in this session. We are accomplishing nothing by that means. Senators on the other side are contending that it is an attack upon the President of the United States, and are defending it upon that theory alone. But, Senators, that is not the question to be determined. It is not a question whether the President is right or wrong. The question is—and we should assume the responsibility of it—What shall be done by the American Government in order to protect its citizens in Mexico? We have no right to shift that responsibility upon the executive department or upon any other country. It is a question that we should deal with frankly and courageously and determine what the country ought to do under these circumstances.

"I have submitted this resolution for the purpose of making that direct and positive issue for Congress to determine whether we shall do the one thing or the other, and I am quite content to leave it in the first instance to the Committee on Foreign Relations and finally to the Congress of the United States."

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations that I hope this joint resolution will receive consideration; and if it does not within a reasonable time, I may feel called upon to move to discharge the committee from its consideration in order to bring it before the Senate. Of course I am not disposed to do this until the committee has had full opportunity to consider the joint resolution.

SOURCES OF NITROGEN COMPOUNDS (S. DOC. NO. 471).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed as a public document a paper by Chester G. Gilbert, of the Smithsonian Institution, on the sources of nitrogen compounds in the United States. It is a short and a very valuable paper.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REFORM OF JUDICIAL PROCEDURE.

Mr. JONES. I have an article in the Southwestern Law Review relating to the reform of judicial procedure. It seems that there is a bill on the calendar dealing with that subject. It is an article by Hon. Lewis R. Works, judge of the superior court of Los Angeles County, Cal. It is not very long. I think it is a very clear and concise article with reference to this important subject, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the subject?

Mr. JONES. It is on the reform of judicial procedure. We have a bill on the calendar relating to the subject, one that has already passed the House. I think it is a very valuable contribution to that proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Why not have it printed as a public document?

Mr. JONES. I want to have it in the RECORD. Then I will know where to get it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE REFORM OF JUDICIAL PROCEDURE.

[By Hon. Lewis R. Works, judge of the superior court of Los Angeles County, Cal.]

The courts of the United States, whether State or Federal, enjoy in some respects the confidence, while in others they rest under the severe displeasure of the people of the country. Our court system, headed as it is by the Supreme Court of the United States, the greatest judicial tribunal of earth, is justly considered to be an excellent one, if we ask only whether its pronouncements are righteous and just. By this it is not meant to be asserted that the courts have reached perfection in the subject matter of their decrees; but only that in that regard they exhibit as high a degree of efficiency as properly may be expected in a human institution of such a character. But when we come to consider the methods employed and, more especially, the time wasted in the courts, on the way to decree or judgment, the situation is entirely different. The people justly complain of the wearying grind and circumlocution of judicial procedure. And this complaint is, after all and in practical effect, a complaint which goes to the sum total of the effectiveness of the courts in their work, for it boots but little that controversies are in the abstract justly decided if they are so long in being decided that the end does not do entire, or at least substantial, justice for the victor and against the loser. If the mills of the courts do "grind exceeding small," they often grind so slowly that it were better, in particular cases, if they had not been called upon to grind at all, and many a "successful" litigant finds himself at the end of a course of years much in the position of an actual loser, because of the great time expended on his cause, together with the worry incident to such an expenditure.

ENCROACHMENTS UPON THE FUNCTIONS OF THE COURTS.

The feeling that the courts move at a snail's pace, long ago perceived, has lessened gradually and is lessening daily the respect of the public, not only for the courts themselves, but for the administration of justice generally. And in more recent years the feeling has inspired a course of legislation throughout the country the effect of which is to deprive the courts of considerable portions of their time-honored jurisdiction. The Congress and the legislatures of the different States have passed laws confiding to various boards and commissions the solution of large classes of controversies originally cognizable by the courts. It is to be remarked that the central and naturally the attractive attribute of these boards and commissions in the exercise of their functions is that of speed, and speed is secured through the operation of systems of procedure which in a large measure are unclogged and untrammeled by forms, and which are direct and positive in their movements. In short, the machinery of these boards and commissions has been made particularly strong in the respects in which the machinery of the courts has been shown to be particularly weak.

These encroachments upon the functions of courts are likely to increase unless court procedure is greatly simplified until the ordinary judicial tribunals are left with little to do. In an address delivered at Portland, Oreg., in August, 1915, Herbert Harley, secretary of the American Judicature Society, after urging and predicting an effective reform of judicial procedure, said of what may be termed the "board and commission" movement:

"If we looked only upon this swiftly growing movement we might easily forecast a day not far distant when our courts, still dignified and ritualistic, would be holding an empty bag, good for nothing but spanking deliquent juveniles, keeping books for dead men, sorting out crazy folk, marrying spoony couples, and collecting bills for the grocer and the butcher. But we may defer despondency until we shall have tried further the development of the business management principle."

There is at present a stimulated movement throughout the country for the reform of judicial procedure, but it is somewhat sad to assert that the movement is not altogether uninfluenced by the fear of the legal profession that the "board and commission" movement is destined to shear the courts of much of their powers and thus curtail the activities, not to say the incomes, of lawyers unless they proceed, both speedily and vigorously, to "clean house."

THE HISTORY OF REFORM IN JUDICIAL PROCEDURE.

We must not be led, however, into the belief that this country is the only place nor the present the only time in which a reform of judicial procedure has been found necessary. The need for such a reform has existed in every country and in every age. In his admirable "History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella," Prescott says, after referring to various reforms inaugurated by the young sovereigns, after their accession:

"Whatever reforms might have been introduced into the Castilian judicatures, they would have been of little avail without a corresponding improvement in the system of jurisprudence by which their decisions were to be regulated. This was made up of the Visi-Gothic code, as the basis, the fueros of the Castilian prince, as far back as the eleventh century, and the 'Siete Partidas,' the famous compilation of Alfonso the Tenth, digested chiefly from maxims of the civil law. The deficiencies of these ancient codes had been gradually supplied by such an accumulation of statutes and ordinances as rendered the legislation of Castile in the highest degree complex, and often contradictory. The embarrassment resulting from this occasioned, as may be imagined, much tardiness, as well as uncertainty, in the decisions of the courts who, despairing of reconciling the discrepancies in their own law, governed themselves almost exclusively by the Roman."

The promulgation of the codes, pandects, and institutes of Justinian, of the Code Napoleon, the passage of the English judicature act of 1873, the inauguration by David Dudley Field in New York, in the middle of the last century, of the movement for the codification of the law in the various States of the Union, while in some instances covering reforms of substantive as well as of adjective law, are but instances, most of them exceedingly tardy and long delayed, in which attempts have been made to relieve against the pressure of constant but little varying need for reform in judicial procedure.

THE FORMAL REQUIREMENTS OF PROCEDURE.

The reason for such a state of affairs is not far to seek. The courts can discharge their functions only subject to the limitations and restrictions imposed by regulations purely formal, purely "adjective," in their character and necessarily more or less complex. Jones says at the first and second pages of his work on the Law of Evidence:

"However desirable it might be in legal controversies involving the rights of property or the liberty of the citizen, if every fact which might have the slightest bearing on the issue could be adduced, it is manifest that the limitations which surround judicial tribunals render this impossible. Courts are so organized that there must be some limit to the facts which may be given in evidence, as there must be an end of litigation. * * * It is true the reformers have zealously attacked and broken down many of the artificial barriers which formerly prevented suitors from bringing the facts on which they relied to the ear of the court or jury; but it is hardly possible that the courts of civilized countries will ever seek to administer justice without the use of fixed, and to some extent arbitrary rules of evidence."

The principles requiring the existence of rules of evidence equally demand some formal limitations upon the manner of commencing actions, the number and character of persons who may sue or be sued, either singly or together, the manner of stating causes of action or defenses, the manner or propriety of joining different causes of action or different defenses in the same pleading, upon the forms and kinds of motions and demurrers, and upon the many other steps incident to the prosecution and defense of actions from complaint in a trial court to remittitur from an appellate court. In short, the work of the courts is to a great extent necessarily built upon form, form, form.

The existence of so prominent a percentage of formal procedural requirements in the law unavoidably renders the vigorous reform of procedure a perennial need. The practice of the law differs from the practice of all other professions in a most remarkable respect. In every endeavor of the lawyer in the judicial forum he is pitted against an active adversary of his own kind. What the first wants and earnestly strives for, the second as earnestly opposes. If we take the other great learned professions for purposes of comparison, we at once realize that no such contests occur in the practice of medicine. In his individual cases no physician is opposed by another physician who strives mightily to nullify and reverse the efforts of the first. In such a profession there is no attempt to "win" upon the part of one as against another who is equally determined to win. In the law the very essence of its practice lies in the query, "Who shall win?" To the lay mind, at least, and in the minds of many lawyers, the able and successful attorney is the attorney who wins a high percentage of his contests. Verily, with the lawyer, to the victor belongs the spoils: Emolument, reputation, honor. On this account and also because of the very nature of the feelings engendered in the human mind by the spirit of present contest, even the lawyer of high ideals is under constant temptation, against which he has as constantly to fight, to regard a lawsuit as a game of skill, the blood-stirring end of which is a verdict or decisions favorable to him. Here, indeed, there appears a similarity between the practice of the law and of medicine. The physician, and perhaps more especially the surgeon, is in danger of regarding the human body as an insensate mechanism upon which he may tinker; the lawyer, of seeing in his client but a pawn in a fascinating game.

If this pitfall may be seen in the way of the high-minded lawyer, what may be said of that considerable percentage in the profession who know naught of the courts in their true relation to the problems of mankind, as tribunals for the parceling out of justice, and not for the registration of victories. To these men it is everything to win. What golden opportunities are afforded them in a maze of procedural rules. They may resort to forms to embarrass their adversaries, they may hide behind forms to protect and screen themselves. Under such practices forms are added to forms; and conflicting constructions of forms, and ever-ramifying rules adding to or explaining them, constantly spring into being and ever-increasing confusion results. Forms erected by one generation in aid of the administration of justice become, ere a new generation has appeared upon the scene, grossly glaring instruments of injustice and of delay.

THE NATIONAL DEMAND FOR REVISION.

If it be true that all other times and all other countries have known the need of a reform of judicial procedure, it can not be gainsaid that this time and Nation do know such a need. California, together with most of the other States in the Union, is actually suffering under the demand. Our Code of Civil Procedure, which went into effect in 1873, 43 years ago, has never had a systematic revision. It has been amended in various of its sections many times, however, during the intervening years, but the work has been partial, unsystematic, and unscientific. The code is to-day both obsolete and an alarming piece of patchwork.

At the 1915 convention of the California State Bar Association a motion was adopted for the naming of a committee, to report at the session of 1916 "upon the advisability of changing the practice act so that purely procedural matters may be prescribed by rule of the supreme court rather than by legislative enactment." The committee consists of R. S. Gray, Garrett W. McEnerney, Percy V. Long, and Walter Perry Johnson, of San Francisco, and Joseph P. Loeb and Lewis R. Works, of Los Angeles, although William J. Hunsaker, of the latter place, was but recently also a member, having been forced to resign because of the press of his practice. It will be noted that this committee, under its strict powers, can only report upon the advisability of delegating to the supreme court of the State the power to govern and regulate procedure by rules of court. Nevertheless, it is quite possible that the body will present a list of advisable procedural reforms, either as a part of its report or as an appendix to it. The committee has such a plan under actual consideration.

It hardly seems worth while to present an epitome of the respects in which judicial procedure requires reforming, as the changes which might be wrought are exceedingly numerous, and range from matters of great moment and of wide scope to things of the smallest import, although no rule or point of procedure is so unimportant as not to deserve being made exactly right, if it can be so made. Nevertheless, there may be pointed out, with profit, a few of the salient reforms now being urged by the modern thought upon the subject.

THE SIMPLIFICATION OF PLEADINGS.

It may truly be said that every lawsuit in California is unduly delayed by the rules regarding pleading. The system we use, and which is used in nearly all the other States, is archaic and should not much longer be borne. As far back as 1873 the courts of England were put under a system of pleading much in advance of the complex one under which we now labor; and the celebrated municipal court of Chicago, a wonderfully efficient and businesslike tribunal, was a few years ago erected upon a foundation, so far as pleading is concerned, equally as simple and direct. Speaking of that court, Herbert Harley said, in the address already mentioned:

"Judge Stephen Foster was sent to London to learn of the modern English practice, and upon his return a few simple rules, 34 in number, were drafted. They have not been changed since, and under them the miracle of freeing pleading from deadly formality has been fully accomplished. The essence of the rules lies in plain common sense. The plaintiff must at the beginning set forth the substantial facts upon which he bases his claim in an informal and brief statement, supported by affidavit in all cases of liquidated damages. The defendant, then, in order to get a footing in court, must show under oath that he has meritorious defense. Every year thousands of causes are determined by entering judgment on default because the defendant dare not file the affidavit of merits. In other Illinois courts these actions would clog the calendars for months or years.

"While the simple pleadings have tremendously reduced the amount of time wasted in trying incidental issues, it has not been possible to change the rules of evidence, so that simple trials may take an entire day and more involved ones a week or more, in this court as in others."

PROPOSED ABOLITION OF THE DEMURRER.

Another great reform in the field of pleading lies in the impending extirpation of the demurrer, the handmaiden of delay and the enemy of justice. It is no uncommon thing to hear it asserted that the special demurrer should be abolished, and that relic of the past doubtless will soon be no more, in most jurisdictions at least; and it is now occasionally, and with great reason, demanded that the general demurrer should likewise be laid to rest.

THE JURY SYSTEM.

The time-honored "bulwark of liberty," the jury system, is the target of many of those who demand less of form and less of delay in the procedure of the courts. Various plans are proposed as conducive to the speedier selection of juries and the proponents of jury reform measures range from those who suggest plans of the character just mentioned to those who inveigh against the continuance of the jury system in any form whatever, at least in civil cases; and the names of the latter, if they are not legion, make a most respectable list.

In a report to the National Economic League, made by a committee consisting of Charles W. Eliot, Louis D. Brandeis, Moorfield Story, Adolph J. Rodenbeck, and Roscoe Pound, it is said:

"It is probable that we make too much use of the jury as a tribunal for ordinary civil causes. The delay and expense involved in jury trials are very great, and wherever the volume of litigation is large and courts are in session continually, service upon juries has become a grave burden upon the citizen. It is worthy of consideration whether there are advantages in jury trial of ordinary causes upon debt or contract and commercial cases to compensate for the expenditure of time and money which such trial requires. Even in actions upon tort, now that workmen's compensation acts are removing from the forum cases in which plaintiffs looked to juries to mitigate the law, it may be doubted whether jury trial should be used so widely."

THE NEED FOR EFFICIENCY IN THE CONDUCT OF COURTS.

With the mention of these two or three points which have been selected from the myriad suggestions of needed reforms, within the strict realm of procedure, properly so-called, we may turn to one or two proposals affecting the interior conduct and management of the courts themselves. The demand for expert business management, startling as it may seem, has been made and is being made upon the tribunals of justice, and if there be places in which expert business management should not be the order of the day, it is certainly not in the courts, it being understood that the term is applied to the true business or administrative side of courts and to no such part of their activities as would interfere with due and proper deliberation, without delay, in arriving at decisions.

In the first place, every trial court consisting of more than one judge should specialize in its work to as high a degree as the various kinds of causes submitted for its decision will permit. Where each judge on such a bench is working upon a particular line of litigation and bending his energies to the mastering of the problems continually involved in that line, a high degree of contribution to the efficiency of the court must necessarily result. In most courts composed of a number of judges, there are usually criminal branches, probate branches, and the juvenile court, and sometimes other specializations, but there are probably no courts in this country, with the exception of the municipal court of Chicago, in which a proper degree of specialization has been attained. Of that court Herbert Harley says:

"At the beginning the Chicago court had the same measure of specialization that was common in other cities. Certain judges sat in police court and others took their quota of civil causes. It soon became evident that certain classes of causes could be segregated upon special calendars and handled separately to advantage. One judge, for instance, could take care of all the replevin, attachment, and garnishment causes, and become so expert that no lawyer could excel him in knowledge of the statute law and decisions. To another judge was assigned all the actions for the recovery of possession of real estate. The quasi-criminal actions brought under city ordnance by summons were also segregated. The court was becoming organic. Judges were becoming specialists. Increased output of a higher quality was observable. For the first time the conspicuous need for specialist judges in a unified court, as against specialized tribunals with hit-or-miss judges, was met."

In the second place, and notwithstanding the fact that each judge of a trial court must sit by himself and must be responsible for the handling of the causes distributed to him, there should rest in a presiding judge, or in the majority of the court, the authority to remove individual judges from the performance of work for which they are not fitted; and that authority should not merely there rest, it should be vigorously and fearlessly exercised. Authority to handle all other business or administrative affairs of the court, not having to do with the duty of each judge as to his individual causes, should be similarly vested and exercised. Upon these questions the act creating the municipal court of Chicago provides as follows:

"The chief justice, in addition to the exercise of all the other powers of a judge of said court, shall have the general superintendence of the business of said court; he shall preside at all meetings of the judges, and he shall assign the associate judges to duty in the branch courts from time to time, as he may deem necessary for the prompt disposition of the business thereof, and it shall be the duty of each associate judge to attend and serve at any branch court to which he may be so assigned. * * * The chief justice shall also superintend the preparation of the calendars of cases for trial in said court and shall make such classification and distribution of the same upon different calendars as he shall deem proper and expedient. * * * It shall be the duty of the chief justice and the associate judges to meet together at least once in each month * * * and at such other times as may be required by the chief justice, for the consideration of such matters pertaining to the administration of justice in such court as may be brought before them. At such meetings they shall receive and investigate or cause to be investigated, all complaints presented to them pertaining to the said court, and to the officers thereof, and shall take such steps as they may deem necessary or proper with respect thereto."

This act, in this and in other provisions which might be quoted, vests the chief justice of the court with most unusual powers, it must be confessed; and it may be questioned whether the great and acknowledged success of these and other provisions of the act in the conduct of the business of the court may not be due to the dominating and, at the same time, persuasive character of the justly celebrated Harry Olson, who has been the presiding justice of the tribunal since its organization; and whether it may not be doubted to be safe or advisable to vest such powers in one judicial officer designed to work hand in hand with a number of associates.

In passing, it may be remarked that the judges of the superior court of the State of California in and for the county of Los Angeles, now 18 in number, have long held regular monthly meetings, and hold frequent special meetings to consider the business of the court, and that a majority of them frequently exercise most of the powers vested by the language above quoted in the chief justice of the Chicago court.

THE UNIFICATION OF THE JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

There is another proposed reform in the constitution of courts, not relating to their interior management nor subject to their internal control which may be mentioned. It is the movement for "unified courts," so called, and the principle behind it may be stated in the language of Prof. Roscoe Pound, dean of the Harvard University Law School, as follows:

"The whole judicial power of each State * * * should be vested in one great court, of which all tribunals should be branches, departments, or divisions. The business as well as the judicial administration of this court should be thoroughly organized so as to prevent not merely waste of judicial power but all needless clerical work, duplication of papers, records, and the like, thus obviating expenses to litigants and cost to the public."

The idea of a high degree of specialization in the work of judges, already mentioned in this paper, is at the base of the movement for unified courts. In the report of the National Economic League, above referred to, Prof. Pound and his associates said:

"Effective administration of justice in the urban communities of to-day requires a unification of the judicial system whereby the whole judicial power of the State shall be vested in one organization, of which all tribunals shall be branches or departments or divisions. In organizing the personnel of this unified judicial department, the cardinal idea should be to permit the entire judicial force of the Commonwealth to be employed in the most effective manner possible upon the whole judicial business of the Commonwealtn, aiming to have specialist judges rather than specialized courts. Multiplication of tribunals is the first attempt of the law to meet the demand for specialization and division of labor. Yet it is at best a crude device. The need is for judges who are specialists in the class of causes with which they have to deal. This need may be met by specialized courts with specialized jurisdiction. But it may be met also by a unified court with specialist judges, to whom special classes of litigation are assigned."

It needs but another quotation from Prof. Pound to complete a very general view of the character of the movement now under mention:

"To achieve the end of specialist judges rather than specialized courts, the entire judicial power should be committed to one court. This court should be constituted in three chief branches: (1) County courts or municipal courts; (2) a superior court of first instance; and (3) a single ultimate court of appeal."

The unified court plan was put into operation in Great Britain under the judicature acts of 1873 and 1875 and the American Judicature Society, a strong organization with headquarters at Chicago, is devoted to the work of procuring its adoption throughout the United States and has prepared a carefully formulated judicature act to be used generally in prosecuting the work.

HIGHER STANDARDS OF LEGAL EDUCATION DESIRABLE.

It is time to curtail mention of further phases of the movement for the reform of procedure and of the business of the courts, a movement which is receiving such careful attention throughout the land; but it yet remains to note a few general features basic to the need for such reforms. The principal reasons for the existence of so many courts, with so many judges, and for the heavy volume of business in their hands, lie in the frailties of human nature. A vast percentage of the causes which reach the courts should never find place there. Compromise of difficulties, instead of litigation, should be the rule; but we probably may not justly expect warfare in the courts to end until long after the world shall have become satiated with the more sanguinary kind of war. Nevertheless, there are certain questions having to do with the alarming mass of causes in our courts which, in justice to humanity, we may not overlook.

Much ill-advised litigation is launched through the sheer incompetency of lawyers, and the statement is not surprising, for it requires considerable ability to determine, in many instances, whether a would-be plaintiff has a meritorious cause, and the best of lawyers will frequently commence actions which are without merit. Therefore, to the end that our courts may not be clogged with foolish litigation and that the number of our judges may increase in a lessening ratio to the increase in our population, as well as to the end that the poor layman may not unduly suffer from "the slings and arrows of outrageous" advice, let us dedicate ourselves to the idea that the standards of legal education and the requirements for admission to the bar be maintained at a high mark.

But it is not merely from the incompetent lawyer that we suffer in the matter of foolish litigation. We have with us his wiser but less praiseworthy brother, the man who commences the unmeritorious action, knowing that it is not meritorious, or at least doubting its merit, in order to secure the fee involved. He is the man who knows naught of the administration of justice, but who sees in every court room but another Monte Carlo in which he may conduct his games of chance. To protect ourselves from these gentry we should see to it that the profession is kept pure and that its standards are ever kept on high.

It would not be amiss for every lawyer to keep constantly before him the thought, too often utterly forgotten, that he is an "officer of the court," that the court is a place in which justice, with all the sacred meaning of the word, is to be administered. He might also well remember that, upon his admission to practice the law, he took an oath to support the Constitution and laws of the land, and that his oath, as well as the traditions of his calling, imposes upon him a serious, almost holy, moral obligation.

SPEECH OF REAR ADMIRAL BENSON.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have a copy of the speech delivered by rear Admiral William S. Benson, United States Navy, Chief of Naval Operations, in response to the toast "The Navy" at a dinner to the alumni given by the Naval Academy Graduates' Association on Thursday evening the 1st instant. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF REAR ADMIRAL WILLIAM S. BENSON, UNITED STATS NAVY, CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS, IN RESPONSE TO THE TOAST "THE NAVY," AT A DINNER TO THE ALUMNI GIVEN BY THE NAVAL ACADEMY GRADUATES' ASSOCIATION, ON THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 1, 1916.

Mr. Toastmaster, fellow graduates, and guests, in calling upon me to answer to the toast "The Navy," the object of the graduates' association is, I take it, to satisfy, perhaps, the expectation of the service that I give an account of my stewardship as Chief of Naval Operations.

I may preface my remarks by saying that, as time has gone on and the work of the office has developed, more distinctly outlining some of the vast problems involved, I have become more and more fully convinced that those who conceived the idea of creating by law a Chief of Naval Operations have, in the establishment of this office "builded better than they knew." In speaking on this subject, I do so without any intention of making odious comparisons and without any desire to attempt to enlarge upon the importance of the work or to magnify what has been already accomplished; and yet, in order to be quite sincere and candid I must say that upon taking up this work a little over one year ago I started practically from the ground. There were then certain elements of routine being carried out which might in a way be called the fragments of organization, but certainly nothing more. There was no data from which the chief of the office could obtain information at short notice. Only a few hours after assuming office it was necessary that a vessel of a certain class be sent from Hampton Roads to New York, and it took hours to find out just what vessels were available in that vicinity, and particularly what ones were suitable for the duty to be performed. There was no definite data at hand relating to matériel or personnel. In order to find out about matériel it was necessary to send to some other office and get information piecemeal. Information as to personnel and as to the relation between personnel and matériel could only be obtained by consulting the several bureaus' files. In fact no information except what was given in certain regular publications was available to show the relative strength of the various nations of the world. So it was necessary literally to begin at the bottom. It is true there were some efforts at organization which had been carried forward nearly to completion. A board for the organization of the radio service had made its report and recommended an organization for adoption, but this report had not been approved, and the older unformed system in the radio service was still in vogue. Messages for radio transmission were sent out by telephone to Arlington, if received during ordinary office hours, and were given attention by the Arlington operators at their convenience. Messages received at night from Arlington or elsewhere had to await the opening of the office the next morning before being decoded and delivered.

Such facts as these serve to indicate the conditions formerly existing and are recounted simply that the service may know what has been done since the establishment of this office and what is being done now, and I want especially to emphasize them in order that the service may have a true estimate of the situation and not be led astray or unduly influenced by what seems to have been a persistent effort during the past year or so on the part of certain persons and in certain elements of the press to try to create the impression, not only in the mind of the public but even in the minds of naval officers themselves, that nothing has been done in the department to improve conditions. And let me state here that the conditions which I have found to exist could not in any degree be laid at the door of the Secretary. He has at all times shown the most earnest interest and the most cordial sympathy in all the various features recommended for the development of this office, and he has given particular attention to every measure tending to increase its efficiency and the efficiency of the service in general.

The report of the board on the organization of communications, which I have already mentioned, has since been approved and is now in operation, and I do not hesitate to express the firm belief that it is the most thorough and efficient organization of its kind to be found either in the service or out of it. The office space occupied by the Chief of Naval Operations and his staff has been expanded from its formerly overcrowded condition to include nine rooms. These rooms have been cleaned, renovated, and equipped, and they are now kept in a condition that leaves little more to be desired. One of these rooms has been fitted up especially to meet the needs of the communication service. A soundproof compartment has been constructed in which the radio operators are on constant watch day and night, and a space adjoining this compartment has been fitted for the telegraph and telephone operators. A commissioned officer day and night keeps watch to code and decode and to receive and send messages of every character without delay.

The subject of extending communications throughout the world has been given careful attention and, under the direction of Capt. Bullard, the superintendent of the naval radio service, phenomenal progress has been made toward the establishment of a system by which communication within our own country may be developed and improved and, in cooperation with the systems in Pan American countries, expanded throughout the Western Continent. The subject of radio telephony has, through the cooperation of Capt. Bullard and his men with the telephone companies, reached a development little short of marvelous. At the instance of the superintendent of radio, the various companies interested in this question agreed to mobilize their utilities and hold a demonstration which would show to what extent their systems of communications could be used. Some two weeks ago, when this demonstration took place, I sat in my office and within the short space of time of less than two hours I transacted business by land wire and radio telephone with the commandant at the Puget Sound Navy Yard, the commanding officer at Yerba Buena, San Francisco, the commandant at the Mare Island yard, the naval station at New Orleans, the aeronautic station at Pensacola, the commandant of the Charleston Navy Yard, the commanding officer of the New Hampshire, then at sea off the Capes of Virginia, the commandant of the Philadelphia yard, the president of the war college at Newport, and the commandant of the Boston yard. Communication was most satisfactory and conversation between myself and the officers with whom I talked was taken down by a stenographer in my office, so that a complete record of all business transacted was available at once.

Soon after the appointment of the Chief of Naval Operations the duties of the aid for material were transferred by the order of the Secretary of the Navy to the cognizance of the Chief of Naval Operations and were placed immediately in the hands of one of his assistants. This change has served to provide positive means for the Chief of Naval Operations constantly to keep in touch with the material condition of the fleet and with the preparedness of individual vessels for active service. Work of the material bureaus is quickly coordinated under the immediate knowledge and assistance of the office of operations.

A plan of organization of the fleet on a large scale has been worked out and is now in operation. This plan is so arranged as to provide an organization for the entire naval force of the United States, or for any portion of it in any part of the world. The various elements of the fleet have been given definite organization and flag officers have been detailed to the command of each, so that it may be justly said that the fleet is for the first time completely and thoroughly organized.

One of the first steps taken for the improvement of the organization of the fleet was with a view to the betterment of the submarine service, and to this end an officer of high rank has been detailed to command the submarine flotilla

The subject of aviation also has been given especial attention and every effort has been directed toward concentrating the development of aircraft toward a definite service. Aircraft have been placed in the same category as other craft, and the various bureaus have been assigned specific duties bearing upon their construction and development and have assumed the responsibility for the work coming within the cognizance of each.

A thoroughly digested and well-developed plan of mobilization for the entire fleet in the event of war has been submitted to the department and approved. Each bureau and office in the department has been assigned its particular duties in connection with this plan and reports quarterly to the department giving in detail the progress of each toward preparedness to accomplish its task in mobilization.

The General Board has deliberated on the list of available merchant vessels useful for naval purposes in case of war and has determined the characteristics required for the special assignment of each. Guided by these requirements, the board of inspection and survey is now engaged in making a careful inspection of these merchant vessels, reporting for each the necessary alterations and equipment to fulfill the duty to which they have been assigned in the naval auxiliary service. Each merchant vessel inspected is assigned to a certain yard, where, in the event of need, it would be altered and equipped for naval service and where it would be supplied and repaired. The necessary equipment and supplies for such vessels are being sent as rapidly as possible to the yards at which these ships would be outfitted, so that in the case of emergency or war this work will be accomplished in the least possible time. Records are being kept at the department in such condition that complete data are immediately available showing just what vessels could be used, what alterations would be necessary, and in preparation for the event all details, even to the drawing up of contracts, are being perfected in advance.

In past years the organization of naval districts has been merely a nominal one. The plan for the organization of naval districts has within the year been taken in hand and has been worked out in every detail. Each naval district will be organized according to a common scheme, and the general plan, together with a sample organization for one district, will be furnished to each naval district for filling in all data as to number and class of vessels, the organization and duty of personnel, etc. The question of mine localities within our ports and along our shores has been studied, and the number of mines for each district and for our outlying defenses has been determined. Officers have been assigned to the various duties in the district for war service, and the distribution of vessels for the district defenses has been made, each vessel being assigned to its well-defined function in the defense.

Plans have been completed for the mobilization of the Naval Militia, and detailed instructions have been prepared providing that each step in the mobilization shall proceed without interruption and with the utmost expedition. In addition, special attention has been directed to peace-time training of the Naval Militia, and arrangements have been made for sending the Naval Militia to sea this summer on board nine of the older battleships not attached to the active fleet. Arrangements have also been made for a cruise with citizen volunteers for training on the general principle of the Plattsburg encampments conducted by the Army, and during four weeks in the latter part of August and the first half of September these volunteers will cruise at sea and will exercise during the last week with motor boats in conjunction with the battleships, destroyers, and submarines, working out such problems as would arise in time of war.

The organization of the ships in reserve has been given special attention. Not only have the complements been increased, but special attention has been paid to the ratings of the men on board, so that the important stations will at all times have a sufficient number of well-trained men properly to break in the additional personnel that would be required to fill the complements. The ships are kept in material readiness, so that it will be necessary only to fill the complements in order that they may be ready to join the active fleet. A system of periodical inspection of every ship belonging to the Navy has been established, and its good results are already apparent.

Regulations have been drawn up by a joint board for the proper control of the Coast Guard, which automatically comes under the Navy in time of war.

In response to the request of the department, the General Board has been indefatigable in making out the plans and selecting the locations for advanced bases and in determining the location of submarine bases and working out the detailed plans for their development.

The annual period of overhaul for vessels has been discontinued. The old system, under which for 3 months (and often for a longer period) in every 15 vessels of the fleet lay at a navy yard unready in material respects and demoralized in personnel. These demoralizing influences, due to stagnation at navy yards, were well known to every officer, and it will be appreciated that they must have had a very bad effect upon the Navy. It was only natural under the old system of lengthy overhauls that spare parts would be used up and important work postponed that could have and should have been done at once in order to keep the ships in first-class condition. Such prolonged periods of inactivity at a repair yard during which the unavoidable disorder incident to the pressure of large numbers of workmen on board, and sometimes with the added discomfort of climate, could not help but have a very serious and detrimental influence upon the ships' personnel, besides immensely increasing the expense of maintaining the fleet.

At the present time practically every vessel of the fleet is ready to perform its designed duty, except possibly the Georgia, which is to have new boilers installed, and the Connecticut, which is having extended boiler work done, one or two of the earlier submarines now being utilized for experimental purposes and some of the later destroyers.

The equipment of my office has been greatly improved and added to. Data on all essential subjects have been collected and kept near at hand, and are constantly being added to. Because of this improvement, I was able, when called before the House Naval Committee during the present session, to give full and exact information of our own and the other principal navies of the world, and was able to show not only in figures but graphically to the eye the number and type of ships of each of the principal navies of the world. Photographic silhouettes of the ships of the several navies were made and pinned upon sheets in groups according to type, so that a clear idea of the relative strength of the various fleets could be obtained at a glance. These sheets will eventually be placed upon the walls of one of the offices.

An annual program of operations of the fleet has been worked out and adopted, and has so far been followed without difficulty. There is no reason to believe that it can not be successfully followed as a standard yearly program In my office there are kept data and records from which, at a moment's notice, one can determine the whereabouts of every vessel of the service, and within a very few minutes the position of any merchant vessel can be located. On the walls of the office general charts and charts of places of special interest throughout the world are kept on chart rolls in the most convenient manner for easy reference. In another office there is a roll on which are maps showing the interior subdivisions of various countries and giving almost every kind of desirable information connected with the naval service.

Cooperation between the various bureaus and offices of the department with the office of the Chief of Naval Operations has been most cordial and complete, and the practical result has been all that could be desired. One day in each week the Secretary holds in his office a council composed of the chiefs of bureaus, heads of the various offices, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and the Chief of Naval Operations. At these meetings various questions of importance affecting the whole service are considered, the progress of work on ships discussed, new enterprises gone into, and a decision arrived at under the most favorable circumstances for wise action. Through these councils all are kept informed of important work and a hearty cooperation followed by satisfactory execution of the Secretary's decisions is the result. In addition to this weekly council, the Secretary of the Navy, through his own efforts, has organized a naval advisory council, known as the Naval Consulting Board, which, with his approval and sympathy, is collecting vast stores of information regarding the industrial resources of the country and is perfecting a plan for the utilization of these industries for the support and assistance of the Army and Navy for the defense of the country in time of need.

A thoughtful consideration of the work that has been accomplished will show that all is being done now that could reasonably be expected from a so-called General Staff. In my opinion, the organization that exists in the department and that is now in successful operation is accomplishing in a purely American and businesslike manner all that could possibly be expected from the creation of a general staff, and is, I believe, doing this in a much more satisfactory way. It is folly to talk of or to advocate clothing a Chief of Staff or a Chief of Naval Operations with authority independent of the head of the Navy. Such independent authority would lead only to confusion and would do great harm. The fact that the bureaus as now constituted represent the different sections of the General Staff, that they have their special appropriations, and are responsible for the proper expenditure of moneys under their control and of the proper development and operation of the various parts of the Naval Establishment under their cognizance, gives, in my opinion, to the organization of the Navy Department a distinctive strength and an added efficiency not possible under a so-called General Staff organization. The present organization should be made stable and permanent, and if legislation is necessary to make this absolutely sure, then there can be no doubt that such legislation should be enacted, but in considering any legislation care should be taken that too great restriction is not imposed upon the freedom of action of the head of the Navy.

I desire to add that all the results I have related have been accomplished with the Secretary's assistance. No new legislation has been necessary, and all that has been required of me has been to present the need and desirability of changes and improvements in order to receive the Secretary's sympathetic attention. He does not blindly yield to suggestions, but gives them the most earnest and thoughtful consideration. As the Secretary has often reiterated, his only requirement is that the proposed change shall add to the efficiency of the Navy, in order that both the Navy's personnel and matériel may be capable of rendering and may be made to render 100 per cent efficiency. This policy of 100 per cent efficient service has been the basic creed of the Office of Operations, and when we shall have fulfilled that policy every unit of the fleet will at all times be read to perform its functions, whatever the occasion that may require its service.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an extract from an address delivered by Daniel W. Mead, professor of hydraulic and sanitary engineering, University of Wisconsin, Madison, Wis., on "The practical side of water-power development," be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think that article ought to go to the Committee on Printing for action. That is the usual course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there an objection? Does the Senator from Florida object?

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have it go to the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go to the Committee on Printing.

THE FUTURE OF CULEBRA.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have here an article from the New York Sun of June 18, 1916, entitled "Are subterranean gases cause of Panama Canal slides," written by Hon. Thomas Kearns, of Utah, formerly a member of this body, which, with the editorial comment upon it by the Sun, I should like to have printed as a public document, omitting the pictures but including two diagrams. I regard the article an interesting and valuable contribution to the subject on which it treats.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have the article go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that none of the illustrations be inserted except a diagram.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being an objection, the article will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

WIND RIVER RESERVATION, WYO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 733) providing for patents to homesteads on the ceded portion of the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That any person who, prior to the passage of this act, made homestead entry on the ceded portion of Wind River Reservation, in

Wyoming, who has not abandoned the same, whose entry is still existent and of record, and who has been unable to secure water for the irrigation of the land covered by his entry, may secure title to the same upon the submission of satisfactory proof that he has established and maintained actual bona fide residence upon his land for a period of not less than eight months, and upon payment of all sums remaining due on said land, as provided for by the act of March 3, 1905.

Mr. WARREN. The House has amended the Senate bill, and I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EVA M. BOWMAN.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 136) for the relief of Eva M. Bowman.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment and request a conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. ASHURST, Mr. LANE, and Mr. CLAPP conferees on the part of the Senate.

COURT OF PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1840) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories," approved March 3, 1891, and the acts amendatory thereto, approved February 21, 1893, June 27, 1898, and February 26, 1909, which was, on page 2, line 7, to strike out "section."

Mr. GALLINGER. On behalf of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and at his request I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF ZEBULON BAIRD VANCE.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in accordance with a notice which is found upon the calendar, given some two weeks ago, and also in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Senate, I send forward a letter from his excellency the governor of North Carolina, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Raleigh, June 20, 1916.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to inform you that the General Assembly of North Carolina, by joint resolution, directed that the governor and council of state procure a statue of her illustrious citizen, Zebulon Baird Vance, governor, Member of the House of Representatives, and Senator, to be placed in Statuary Hall, the Capitol, Washington, D. C., pursuant to the act of Congress. By virtue of said resolution the governor, with the approval of the council of state, appointed William A. Hoke, Mrs. M. V. Moore, Miss Laura Lindsay Carter, Clement Manly, and John Henry Martin a commission to procure and have said statue erected.

I am informed by the commission that the statue, made by Gutzon Borglum, has been duly placed in position and is now ready to be presented to you. As governor of the State of North Carolina, it affords me pleasure to present to the people and Government of the United States the statue of Zebulon Baird Vance, distinguished soldier, citizen, and statesman.

Your obedient servant, LOCKE CRAIG, Governor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I offer a concurrent resolution, and ask that it be read. Later I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 24) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of Zebulon Baird Vance, presented by the State of North Carolina to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered to the State of North Carolina for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for the high purpose of his life, and his distinguished services to the State and Nation.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, with the completion of the two wings added to the old Capitol, one now occupied by the House of Representatives and the other by the Senate, the old House of Representatives was left deserted and silent. The scenes enacted there in that old Chamber for 50 years were only a precious memory, and the echoes made by the noise of footsteps only recalled the eloquent voices which had once so stirred the Members who sat there to make laws for their country.

For the utilization of this deserted Chamber many plans were submitted. The late Senator Morrill, then a Member of the House, finally submitted the following plan, which was approved and became a law on the 2d day of July, 1869:

The President is authorized to invite all the States to provide and furnish statues, in marble or bronze, not exceeding two in number for each State, of deceased persons who have been citizens thereof and illustrious for their historic renown or for distinguished civic or military services, such as each State may deem to be worthy of this national commemoration; and when so furnished the same shall be placed in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, in the Capitol of the United States, which is set apart, or so much thereof as may be necessary, as a national Statuary Hall for the purpose herein indicated.

His remarks in speaking to the passage of this bill are worthy to be quoted here, and were as follows:

Congress is the guardian of this fine old Hall, surpassing in beauty all the rooms of this vast pile, and should protect it from desecration. Its noble columns from a quarry exhausted and incapable of reproduction—

Nature formed but one,
And broke the die in molding.

Its democratic simplicity and grandeur of style and its wealth of association, with many earnest and eloquent chapters in the history of our country, deserve perpetuity at the hands of an American Congress. It was here that many of our most distinguished men, whose fame "the world will not willingly let die," began or ended their career.

It appears to me eminently proper, therefore, that this House should take the initiative in setting apart with reverent affection the Hall, so charged with precious memories, to some purpose of usefulness and dignity. To what end more useful or grand, and at the same time simple and inexpensive, can we devote it than to ordain that it shall be set apart for the reception of such statuary as each State shall elect to be deserving of this lasting commemoration? Will not all the States with generous emulation proudly respond, and thus furnish a new evidence that the Union will clasp and hold forever all its jewels—the glories of the past, civil, military, and judicial—in one hallowed spot where those who will be here to aid in carrying on the Government may daily receive fresh inspiration and new incentives?

"To scorn delights and live laborious days?" and where pilgrims from all parts of the Union, as well as from foreign lands, may come and behold a gallery filled with such American manhood as succeeding generations will delight to honor, and see also the actual form and mold of those who have inerasably fixed their names on the pages of history.

North Carolina, one of the old original thirteen States, now claims her right and the happy privilege to place in that gallery of renowned statesmen, heroes, soldiers, and patriots one of her foremost citizens, illustrious and distinguished for his services to his State and his country, both in peace and in war—a patriot and a leader among men, idolized by all his people.

For 50 years the State of North Carolina failed to avail herself of this generous offer of Congress. But when the time came to make selection of him to be so greatly honored and revered, among all the great and noble men of the State from its early history, distinguished Americans, patriots, statesmen, lawyers, judges, builders of the State and country, great Senators and governors, as they all passed in review the eyes of the people instinctively turned upon one man, and with one accord, without a dissenting voice, selected the great commoner, Zebulon Baird Vance.

As the beautiful mountains in which he first saw the light towers over the lovely valleys lying below, as Mount Mitchell, the highest peak east of the Rocky Mountains, towers over the other peaks of the Appalachian Range, out of which it lifts its lofty head, at the foot of which Senator Vance built his beautiful home, so in the hearts of his countrymen he towers over all the great array of men who had become distinguished in the State and our country's history. He had loved them, led them, and suffered with them in the dark days, in the days of distress and gloom, amid the storms, their distress, and defeat; and then after the storm was over, after the disaster, the suffering, the distress, and defeat he led them in sunshine and to triumphant victory.

He had faithfully represented them in the House of Representatives. He had led them and fought with them upon the bloody field of battle. He had served them in the executive chair so ably and conspicuously that he became far and wide renowned as the greatest of the war governors; and when the clouds had passed away and the evil days had gone, again as their governor upon its ruins had helped to rebuild the old State, and with great ability and eminent statesmanship for more than 12 years had served them in the Senate, and finally had died at his post of duty. He loved the people and the people loved him as few public men had ever been loved.

His heroic statue now stands in Statuary Hall with Washington and Lincoln, Lee and Grant, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and with other renowned statesmen and patriots whose States have placed them there for our countrymen to admire and revere, and that they may derive "fresh inspiration and new incentives" to their country's honor and glory.

In this age of commercialism we are inclined to forget the men whose high ideals and devotion to duty have aided in the upbuilding of this great Government and the preservation of the immortal principles upon which it was founded. In the mad rush for place and position it is well to have just such object lessons as are found in that gallery of statesmen to remind us that our happiness and the blessings of liberty we enjoy are interwoven with the efforts, hardships, and the accomplishments of those who have lived before us. The history of those lives is the history of our country.

Senator Vance's ancestors were of Scotch-Irish descent. They settled in North Carolina before the Revolution, and both his paternal and maternal ancestors fought in that great struggle for independence—one at Valley Forge with Washington and the other at Ramseurs Mill and Kings Mountain. Both aided in the erection of this wonderful superstructure which guarantees political liberty and individual freedom. From them he inherited his great courage, his patriotism, and his rugged honesty. Senator Vance had combined in him the humor and known wit of the Irish, and the logic, the perseverance, the insight, and love of liberty of the Scotch. Upon the hustings, in the office, the social circle, in every company and on every occasion he enlivened it with his wit, brightened it with his humor, and charmed it with his jovial good nature.

He was born in the county of Buncombe, on the 13th day of May, 1830, in the Blue Ridge Mountains, near the French Broad River, whose waters dash, sing, and roar over the rugged rocks on through the great forests between the great mountains on to the sea.

He spent his early life upon the farm. He acquired a good education in the village school, and when prepared he attended Washington College, Tennessee, and then one year at the university of the State; read law and received his license to practice, and soon thereafter was elected county attorney.

At the age of 21 he was elected county attorney, at the age of 24 he was elected to the house of commons, at the age of 28 he was elected to Congress, and at the age of 30 was reelected to Congress for a second term. At the age of 31, in 1861, he volunteered for the war and was elected captain and then colonel of the famous fighting Twenty-sixth Regiment North Carolina State troops in the Confederate Army. At the age of 32 he was elected governor of the State of North Carolina, and at the age of 34 he was reelected governor for a second term. At the age of 40 he was elected United States Senator, but was denied admission upon the ground that his political disabilities had not been removed. At the age of 46 he was again elected governor of his State. At the age of 49 he was again elected to the United States Senate and took his seat, and every six years thereafter was reelected to the Senate until his death in this city at the age of 64 years, having been elected four times to this great body. Thus step by step, from his early manhood, higher and higher his people heaped promotions and honors upon him and elevated him to positions of confidence and trust, in all of which positions he achieved distinction. He never betrayed his people. He served them in all these positions with fidelity and great ability and never a breath of scandal or criticism of his integrity and honesty was ever made against him by either friend or foe.

While at the front fighting with his regiment to one of his constituents who was urging him to give his consent for the people of his district to elect him to the Confederate Congress, he replied as follows:

> You remember well the position I occupied upon the great question which so lately divided the people of the South. Ardently devoted to the old Union and the forms which the Federal fathers established, I clung to it so long as I thought there was a shadow of a hope of preserving, purifying, or reconstructing it. And you will also remember that in the last official communication I had the honor to make to my constituents as their Representative I pledged myself in case all our efforts for peace and justice at the hands of the North should fail, that their cause was mine, their destiny was my destiny, and that all I had and was should be spent in their service. Those hopes did fail, as you know, signally and miserably fail; civil war was thrust upon the country and the strong arm of northern despotism was stretched out to crush and subdue the southern people. I immediately volunteered for their defense, in obedience not only to this promise, but also, as I trust, to patriotic instincts; and I should hold this promise but poorly fulfilled should I now, after having acquired sufficient knowledge of military affairs to begin to be useful to my country, escape its obligations by seeking or even accepting a civil appointment.

He had been elected to Congress in 1854 as a State Rights American. At home and in Congress he was an outspoken Union man. He loved the flag his fathers had fought to establish, but he also believed, as he had been taught, that his first duty was to his State. When his State, which had voted in April, 1861, to stay in the Union, finally had to take her choice whether to fight with and for her neighbors or against them, on the 20th of May, a month following, unhesitatingly seceded from the Union, he, as was his duty to do, went with his people and at once volunteered to fight in their defense, and he went into the war with his whole heart and soul. He was making a speech at Asheville, in his district, for the preservation of the Union when Mr. Lincoln's proclamation arrived and was handed him. His hand came down and his voice raised for volunteers for the war.

Some time after this the people of the State began to hold meetings and in the press began to call upon him to consent to allow them to run him for governor. Time and again he was importuned to do so, and then from the battle front he wrote to a friend as follows:

> Believing that the only hope of the South depended upon the prosecution of the war at all hazards and to the utmost extremity so long as the foot of an invader pressed Southern soil, I took the field at an early day, with the determination to remain there until our independence was achieved. My convictions in this regard remain unchanged. In accordance therewith I have steadily and sincerely declined all promotion save that which placed me at the head of the gallant men whom I now command. A true man should, however, be willing to serve wherever the public voice may assign him. If, therefore, my fellow citizens believe that I could serve the great cause better as governor than I am now doing, and should see proper to confer this great responsibility upon me, without solicitation on my part, I should not feel at liberty to decline it, however conscious of my own unworthiness.
> In thus frankly avowing my willingness to labor in any position which may be thought best for the public good, I do not wish to be considered guilty of the affectation of indifference to the great honor which my fellow citizens thus propose to bestow upon me. On the contrary, I should consider it the crowning glory of my life to be placed in a position where I could most advance the interests and honor of North Carolina, and, if necessary, lead her gallant sons against her foes. But I shall be content with the people's will. Let them speak.

He was elected governor in 1862 and was reelected in 1864, and during this most stormy, trying, and saddest period of the State's history he served with the highest executive ability and exhibited a degree of wisdom, far-seeing sagacity, and ability for organization rarely ever seen in any man. He equipped and sent to the Confederate Army more troops than any other Southern State. Her soldiers were better clad and her people had more comfort at home.

All the ports of the South had been blockaded and soon after his inauguration he conceived the idea of "running the blockade," and organized a fleet of blockade runners from Wilmington, N. C., to European and South American ports, by means of which he was enabled to export cotton and receive in exchange shoes, cloth, cotton cords, and other necessities of life for the soldiers and people at home, which he successfully carried on during nearly the entire war. In every county he organized relief societies to save the poor from starvation, and did everything possible that could be done to care for the women and children while his soldiers were away fighting in defense of the State. He upheld the rights of the courts and the individuals, and refused to suspend or allow to be suspended the great writ of habeas corpus.

At the close of the war he was arrested and confined in the old Capitol Prison, but when the records were shown of his kind treatment of the 10,000 starving Union soldiers confined at Salisbury, in his State, his appeal to his own people to share their scanty subsistence with them, and his appeal to the authorities of the North for an exchange of prisoners, he was granted an early discharge. He returned home, sad at heart, to share with his people their poverty and defeat. He began the practice of the law for a livelihood, but his people called upon him again to serve them and lead them.

In the great campaign of 1876, when the people of the State determined to rid themselves from carpetbag misrule and the rottenness and corruption that then obtained in high places, from the insult and oppression of the misguided negro—their former slaves—from the chaotic conditions that then prevailed in the State, they again called upon Gov. Vance to be their Moses to lead them out of the wilderness of their troubles and humiliation; and the Democratic Party, with which he had allied himself, selected him as their standard bearer and nominated him for governor. The Republicans had nominated one of the ablest debaters in that State, and then in joint canvass they began one of the ablest, bitterest, and most exciting campaigns ever known or ever will be known again in that State.

Mr. President, although quite a young man, I was with him occasionally in that campaign and with others followed him to his different appointments in the State. I saw the great multitude of men, women, and children who flocked to see him and hear him. I saw the great cavalcades that came cheering to welcome him and escort him on the highways to his appointments. Many of them would follow him about from appointment to appointment and never tire of hearing him. I have seen that great form rise to speak and then the wild cheering. I have heard him address the multitude, at times moving them to tears, at times moving them to uncontrollable laughter at his sallies of wit and humor; have heard those delightful anecdotes with which he clinched some of his strongest points, heard his unanswerable logic, his fierce invective, ridicule, and sarcasm, and his flow of eloquence, and altogether, like a mighty torrent, it would carry the crowd with him and would so warm their hearts that with mighty cheers—

> They threw their hats
> As they would hang them on the horns of the moon,
> Shouting their exultation.

"They heard him with rapture and exultant joy." I have seen that magnificent presence of his rise when the masses, wrought up to great excitement, like the waves of the sea in a great storm wrought up to wildest fury, when it seemed they were almost ready to mob his opponent, lift his arm and wave his hand for order, and in a moment they were as quiet as the grave and were listening in respectful silence to the great speech of his opponent. He always had wonderful control of his audience. It was one triumphant march from the mountains to the sea. He was elected. Nothing could stop the great victory which came to him.

With his election came peace, race antagonism was in a measure allayed, and the old Commonwealth started on its onward march upward to happiness and prosperity. Red strings, Ku Klux, and secret political societies of all kinds were heard of no more. Frequent murders, arson, rape, riots, and rapine ceased. Justice was administered to all alike by the courts, good order was restored, and the people who builded this great Commonwealth came into their own again.

He began at once to plan for the settlement of the great debt that was burdening the people, to provide for the education of the white people and the black people alike, to provide for the care of the insane, the deaf, dumb, and blind, and relieve the people of the terrible burdens under which they were then suffering, all of which, in a measure, matured. He called a great meeting of the colored men of the State to meet at the capitol and addressed them in words of wisdom and tenderness, advising them that he was their governor; and the kindly advice he then gave had its effect to this day and accounts somewhat for the cordial relations which now exists between the races in that State.

He honored me with a position, with his confidence and his friendship. I was closely associated with him and knew him in the executive office and in the home circle. I loved him for his uniform kindness. I admired him for his genius, his great courage and patience under most trying circumstances. I enjoyed his brilliant conversation and his rich, rare, and racy fund of anecdotes, his humor, and jovial disposition. While his soul was full of wit and humor, he was serious and often engaged in the deepest thought, and found time to write his celebrated lecture upon the "Scattered Nation."

Perhaps the only thing for which he was seriously criticized while governor was his too free use of the pardoning power. I have seen the little blind girl pleading for the pardon of her aged father, the wife pleading for her husband, and the mother for her boy bring him to tears. His great tender heart could not resist their appeals. Tenderness, sympathy, and mercy were part of his nature. He would often yield when he knew that his action was taken in the face of adverse opinion. Free from egotism, he was one of the most approachable of men, and the executive chamber was always open to all comers without regard to their standing in life. His majestic form, his resonant voice, his long flowing locks, the merry twinkle of the eye, and his simple manners, his open-heartedness, impressed everyone who came in his presence. They felt they stood in the presence of a great man, but were unafraid and at once felt at home.

His people would not permit him to remain long in the executive chair, and two years after he had been inaugurated governor he was elected to the Senate and was sworn in as a Member of this body on the 4th day of March, 1879. He at once took high rank in this body and was recognized as one of its greatest debaters. He was on some of the most important committees, but his greatest work was upon the Finance Committee. Perhaps his greatest speech here was upon the tariff question. He carefully attended to the wants of his constituents, was very industrious, and contributed by his wisdom to many important public measures.

His great reputation had preceded him here, and he suffered not by his close associations with his colleagues, in his service here, or by his activities in the Nation's counsels.

Imbued with the doctrine of State rights, loving the South, her people and her tradition with a fervor amounting to passion, he viewed with distrust and suspicion every measure which seemed to him to point to a centralization of power in the Federal Government.

Imbued with the spirit of chivalry, with high ideals of honor and a lover of the truth, he was ever on the side of right and justice, and the cause of the people found in him a bold and steadfast champion.

Among his colleagues in the Senate there were great men of great minds and great ability; statesmen of long and large experience, but with them he suffered not by comparison.

He was a great reader of the Bible and had an abiding faith in the truth of the Christian religion and the immortality of the soul. Not in years, but worn with cares, duties, honors, and responsibilities of a long life of arduous service to his people and his country, having completed his work, his great soul passed into eternity, and the people of his State without regard to party, race, sex, or creed bowed their heads in sorrow. Women wept and strong men shed tears as they walked along the streets.

Three times governor of a great State; twice elected to the House of Representatives; four times elected to the United States Senate. Can there be found in the annals of our history such a record?

To perpetuate his memory his native county has erected a great monument to him in the city of Asheville, his people a bronze statue of him in the beautiful capitol grounds, and his State now has placed in the abiding place of the Nation's immortals, in bronze, his chiseled form and features in memory of the deeds of the past and to be an inspiration to those who come after us to kindle the fires of patriotism and stir the hearts of the youth of the land to greater and nobler endeavor for the glory and honor of our great country.

Like a granite pillar chiseled from his own native quarries, his life rises above us, lofty and massive, and yet graceful. It rises above the clouds of troubles and hardships he endured, and, sun kissed; it stands in the light of heaven, a monument of a glory that is past and a guide to that which is to be.

> The potentates on whom men gaze,
> When once their rule has reached its goal,
> Die into darkness with their days.
> But monarchs of the mind and soul,
> With light unfailing and unspent,
> Illumine fame's firmament.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I entered the Senate, in March, 1893, Senator Vance was one of its ablest, best-known, and most popular Members. My acquaintance with him was necessarily brief, because within a year after my coming into the Senate Senator Vance died. It is no slight evidence, however, of the power of his personality and of his personal attraction that I felt that by his death I had lost a friend, for he had made me his friend in those few short months. I was a young man and on the other side, politically, but nevertheless he dwells with me now as one of the most vivid memories of my early days in the Senate and stands out a marked and gracious figure in my visions of the past.

Others far better qualified than I will trace here his distinguished career, both in war and in peace. All that I can hope to give is the impression made upon me during the brief year in which I knew him. He had a strong personality, as I have already said; but, unlike some strong personalities, his carried with it nothing but a sense of kindliness and humor, for which delightful qualities indeed he was conspicuous. When he died the feeling that came uppermost, I think, in the minds of all who knew him in the Senate was not of the eminent public man or of his services in the field and in public life. It was that we had lost a friend, a man who had awakened in us the warm feelings of affection. But there was another side to Gov. Vance, far more important even than this, and which I see now more clearly than I did at the time. He was a fine example of a certain type of man who had fought on the Confederate side during the Civil War. There were many of these men in the Senate in those days; now, alas! there are very few. Then for the first time I was brought into personal contact with them. I had been bred in an atmosphere of intense hostility to the principles for which they had fought. I widely disagreed with most of their political views; but I was not long in the society of these men in the Senate—these men of whom Gov. Vance was such an admirable example—without learning keenly to appreciate their strong qualities. Their theories of political action which had guided them in the past, and which guided them then, were not mine and never could be; but they were men of principle and of conviction, and for their principles they had not only fought but they were ready to sacrifice themselves to them if need came in the less dangerous but more insidious trials of public life. They were men of traditions. They had the old American traditions strong within them, as did the men from the North, who fought against them. What I mean precisely by this it would take more time to explain than I have to give, but I think everyone who knows and loves our history will understand what I mean.

Above all, Gov. Vance and those who shared his principles and had fought with him in the Civil War, were men who believed profoundly that there were certain things for which the individual life ought to be sacrificed, and that there were higher ideals to be followed than living in comfort and safety with opportunity to accumulate money. They were to the fullest extent like those whom they met in arms upon the battle fields of the Civil War, of the race of men who fought the Revolution, and they resented dishonor or humiliation for their country as they would have resented it for themselves. Rather than have their Nation undergo humiliation or be dishonored, rather than sacrifice principles in which they believed, they were ready to fight, and if need be give their lives. They and the men who fought for the Union, however they differed, went to war in the same spirit, which has, I believe, at all times ever been the true American spirit. When it is extinguished, then the end of the Republic is not far off.

In Gov. Vance one saw first his wit and humor, his geniality and good comradeship, and everyone loved him for these most attractive qualities. But as one came to know him better one felt that he was a representative of those by whose toil and sacrifice and courage great nations are made. Nobody could doubt for a moment that Gov. Vance would die rather than be

> One of a Nation, who, henceforth, must wear
> Their fetters in their souls.

Therefore North Carolina does well to give his statue to the Nation, and we do well to honor and recall his memory here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, citizens of North Carolina have made records for patriotism, from the days of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence on down to the present time, unsurpassed in the annals of history. Her sons have rendered distinguished service as lawyers, as soldiers, and as statesmen.

The bench has never been occupied by greater jurists than Gaston, Iredell, Ruffin, and Pearson. To the brilliant galaxy of American soldiers North Carolina contributed, among others, Gens. Graham, McDowell, Hoke, and Hill. Her statesmen have given splendid service to the entire country, and from among their number may be mentioned Macon, Mangum, Graham, and Merriman.

When the question arose in North Carolina of selecting from her distinguished sons one whose statue should grace the National Statuary Hall, the citizens of that State found many worthy of the place. It might well have been expected that difficulty of decision would develop, but there was no division of sentiment as to who should be chosen. With one voice North Carolinians named him, Zebulon B. Vance, and no one questions that the naming was justly made.

I knew him from my childhood to the hour of his death. He was devoted to the University of North Carolina and visited that institution frequently. There he was always a guest of my father, who was a professor of the university. I was at his bedside through the long, long night when he died. It is a privilege to join with North Carolinians and pay tribute to his memory.

He was a great executive officer. He was governor of North Carolina during the Civil War, and as a result of his calm, forceful, determined administration of the affairs of the State, North Carolina's troops were the best clad and the best fed of any of the troops of the Southern States.

Of him it can justly be said he was the most successful and valued governor of a Southern State during the Civil War. But I do not believe North Carolinians for this reason selected his statue for the Hall of Fame.

He was a great legislator, wise, thoughtful, tireless, progressive, practical. If his public services had been limited to his legislative career he would rank among the first, but I do not believe North Carolinians for this reason selected his statue for the Hall of Fame.

He was a wonderful orator. With powerful logic he could array facts in simple language, clear and convincing. With a humor and a wit never equaled, he could delight his audience, while he charmed them with his pathos and won them with his logic. But I do not believe North Carolinians for this reason selected his statue for the Hall of Fame.

If I may name what I believe placed Zebulon B. Vance above all others with his constituents, I would say it was his intense, all-controlling, all-sustaining love for his State and his people. He loved them with a great, unfailing love. It was a love which unselfishly led him in his every thought and act, which dominated his life, which was his very life. There never was a moment when that love failed to control and inspire him in their service or when he would not willingly have died for his people and his State.

North Carolinians knew how he loved them, and they almost worshipped him in return. Great deeds make great men, but a great, unselfish love for his people made every act of the life of this wonderful man an act of loyal, joyous service to the people of North Carolina and to his fellow men.

He had faith in the power of love and rejoiced in the service which it produced; and if he were here to speak to-day, and were permitted to select from his marvelous record a tribute to his memory to account for the honor which his constituents have given him, I believe he would have us say, "His whole life was given to the service of his people, he loved them so; he loved his fellow men."

The beautiful lines of Leigh Hunt suggest, but do not adequately present, the love of this son of the old North State:

ABOU BEN ADHEM AND THE ANGEL.

Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw, within the twilight in the room,
Making it rich, like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest thou?" The vision raised its head,
And with a look made of all sweet accord
Answer'd, "The names of those who love the Lord."
"And is mine one?" said Abou. "Nay, not so,"
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still, and said, "I pray thee, then,
Write me as one who loves his fellow men."
The angel wrote and vanish'd. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And show'd the names whom love of God had blest;
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest!

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the concurrent resolution which I have heretofore submitted and which has been read.

The concurrent resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I now offer the concurrent resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Noth Carolina.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing, the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Zebulon Baird Vance presented by the State of North Carolina, 16,500 copies, with suitable illustration, of which

5,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Carolina.

SENATORS IN NATIONAL CONVENTIONS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will pardon me, with his permission, I ask unanimous consent to make a few observations, utterly nonpartisan in character, with reference to the activities of the members of the great parties of the United States in the recent political conventions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, we have but just returned from the great nominating conventions held by the two great political parties. What a superb demonstration their action presented of how we, in free democratic America, change our rulers! Be it said to the everlasting credit and honor of our country, these conventions have placed before the people four honorable and patriotic citizens as nominees for President and Vice President.

Mr. President, we have been quite accustomed to hear that the United States Senate, as a body, has outlived its usefulness; that its Members cut no figure at home and have little or no influence abroad. In order to dispel such an impression and to discount, to some degree at least, the somewhat prevalent but unjust estimate that the Senate of the United States is a useless and antiquated institution, without much influence at home and of slight regard abroad, I think it will be of some interest to recount the part taken by the Members of the Senate in the recent conventions of the great political parties. This hastily prepared recital may seem inadequate and possibly invidious, and yet no possible slight is intended for any of my colleagues who figured to any extent in the proceedings of these great national gatherings.

In the first place, the presiding officer of the Senate, the Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL, was renominated for Vice President of the United States by the Democratic national convention. He was presented in a ringing speech by the honored Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]. Four distinguished Members of the Senate—Messrs. WEEKS, SHERMAN, CUMMINS, and LA FOLLETTE—were active candidates for the presidential nomination in the Republican convention. The claims of each for the honor were duly set out in splendid nominating speeches, and each received a respectable number of votes from loyal supporters.

A Member of the Senate, Mr. HARDING, of Ohio, was both the temporary and permanent presiding officer of the Republican convention, and had the honor of sounding his party's so-called "keynote" for the campaign.

Another Member of the Senate—Mr. JAMES, of Kentucky, was the permanent presiding officer of the St. Louis convention, and covered himself with glory and reflected honor upon his party while serving in that most responsible position.

Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, was chairman of the committee on platform, and had much to do with the drawing of that important pronouncement in the Republican convention. He had associated with him upon the subcommittee of that committee Senators SUTHERLAND, of Utah; BORAH, of Idaho; OLIVER, of Pennsylvania; WADSWORTH, of New York; and FALL, of New Mexico. Thus the Senate Members comprised two-thirds of the membership of the subcommittee, and thereby absolutely framed and formulated the chart of party faith.

Senator STONE, of Missouri, was chairman and master spirit of the committee on platform in the St. Louis convention. He chose four of his colleagues upon this floor as members of the subcommittee, as follows: Mr. WALSH, of Montana; Mr. HOLLIS, of New Hampshire; Mr. MARTIN, of Virginia; and Mr. POMERENE, of Ohio. Upon the committee proper there were also Senators THOMPSON, of Kansas; RANSDELL, of Louisiana; JOHNSON, of Maine; WILLIAMS, of Mississippi; and PITTMAN, of Nevada. Also the keen and active service of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. TAGGART] was everywhere apparent.

Upon the important committee on credentials, and at its head, always controlling its decisions and directing its counsels, in the Republican convention, was Senator SMOOT, of Utah. This service by no means measures the activities of that Senator in the great gathering, for he was chairman of the special conference committee appointed by the convention to confer with a like committee from the Progressive convention that sought to formulate a basis for a harmonious reunion of the divergent bodies, at one time so wide apart. He had with him upon this delicate mission Senator BORAH, of Idaho. There is no question that these gentlemen had a most potent influence in bringing about a much better understanding between the once belligerent factions of Republicanism. There is little question that they drew the diplomatic report of the all-night harmony conference that Senator SMOOT later on read in the Republican convention.

In this connection it may be well to note the friendly visit of Senator BORAH to the Progressive convention, which he was invited to address. If ever a better speech was delivered upon a like occasion, or one better calculated to bring about a friendly feeling and disposition for harmony, I have not read it.

In the St. Louis convention, appearing before the subcommittee on platform in argument for or against certain planks, and everywhere casting rays of sunshine and inspiration, were Senators JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, and FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, of Nevada.

In the conferences, manipulations, harmony proceedings, and real nominee-making circles of the Chicago Republican gathering there were prominent always Senators PENROSE, of Pennsylvania; WADSWORTH, of New York; SUTHERLAND, of Utah; BRANDEGEE, of Connecticut; LIPPITT, of Rhode Island; SMITH of Michigan, and, unquestionably, others whose names do not now occur to me as marking the ante and extra convention proceedings.

In the suffrage debate at St. Louis the eloquent voices of Senators WALSH, of Montana, and PITTMAN, of Nevada, rose triumphantly above the din, and these splendid advocates were rewarded by the adoption of that plank in the platform.

Senator REED, of Missouri, was one of the eloquent gentlemen who addressed the great St. Louis love feast upon a universal demand for his appearance on the platform.

Senators SAULSBURY, of Delaware, and TILLMAN, of South Carolina, were also there.

Mr. President, let me refer to a number of ex-Senators who played an important part in the Republican convention, namely, Senator Fairbanks, Senator W. Murray Crane, Senator Chauncey Depew, Senator Elihu Root, Senator Theodore E. Burton, Senator William P. Jackson, and also Senators CATRON, PENROSE, and SMOOT.

At the Democratic convention it was Senator HUSTING who introduced a resolution on Americanism. Then, too, it was Senator OWEN who was mentioned as a candidate for the Vice Presidency, but he most graciously withdrew in favor of our honored and efficient Vice President, Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL.

It was Senator THOMPSON who moved to suspend the rules in order that Hon. William J. Bryan might address the convention.

Senator JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS for a time presided as chairman of that great convention.

Several Senators are named upon the committees of both conventions that are to formally advise the nominees of the actions of the respective bodies.

Who, in the face of this array of facts, will ever hereafter proclaim that the United States Senate is a lifeless and uninfluential body and that it cuts no figure in national politics? This record is fairly astounding. History has heretofore recorded nothing like it.

Let us gird up our loins, hold up our proud heads, and march onward to yet greater accomplishments.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I renew my motion, made before I yielded to several Senators, that the Senate proceed with the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Page	Smoot
Bankhead	Husting	Phelan	Sterling
Beckham	James	Pittman	Swanson
Brady	Johnson, Me.	Poindexter	Thomas
Bryan	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pomerene	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones	Ransdell	Townsend
Clapp	Lane	Reed	Underwood
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Culberson	McLean	Shafroth	Walsh
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Warren
Curtis	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Williams
Dillingham	Myers	Shields	Works
Fletcher	Newlands	Simmons
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Harding	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I beg to announce the absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] on important public business.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is absent from the Senate by reason of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask that my motion be put.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose to suggest an amendment to the amendment that is now pending, which is the pending question.

Mr. MYERS. I must make a point of order that the question which is before the Senate should be put.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that the Post Office bill is not yet before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Iowa that the Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Iowa stands corrected. I assumed that it was after 2 o'clock.

Mr. MYERS. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is 10 minutes to 2 o'clock, and we could do nothing with the calendar in that time; so what is the use of wasting that 10 minutes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, possibly that may be true for the day; but there are a number of us who think that the process of recessing has involved a waste of time. The unfinished business does not hold the Senate until 6 o'clock. The Senators in charge of it on the floor of the Senate get tired before proper adjourning time, and we quit an hour before proper adjourning time. We have taken an hour, then, out of the morning hour——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington raises a point of order, which he will state.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. Then we can vote on the motion; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just speaking in behalf of the regular order.

My MYERS. I ask for a vote on my motion. I think that is the only thing in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless objection is made——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as there seems to be some confusion in the Chamber about what is in order and what is not, I move that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I object to that, and make the point of order that it is not in order. I have made a motion which is pending, and it is not a motion for which a substitute motion may be offered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I am out of order, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.]

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I object to that, and make the point that it is out of order, and that the rules provide for taking up the calendar under Rule VIII at the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division on the vote.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MYERS. I join the Senator from Washington in demanding the regular order. This is the regular order. I only made the motion to keep somebody else from making a different motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order would be the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. MYERS. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what was the decision of the Chair as to the vote on the motion of the Senator from Montana?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was rather of the opinion, although not very decisively, that the "ayes" had it.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the decision of the Chair, then, of course, the regular order is the calendar under Rule VIII, unless a motion is made to take up the unfinished business.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the first bill on the calendar.

PUBLICATION OF LAND-OFFICE NOTICES.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. MYERS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, notwithstanding the objection. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.]

Mr. MYERS. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the "noes" have it. A division is asked for. Those in favor of proceeding with the consideration of the bill will please stand while they are counted by the Secretary. [A pause.] Those who are opposed will now stand. [A pause.]

Mr. MYERS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One thing at a time.

Mr. MYERS. If I wait a moment, I will be too late. [Laughter.] I demand the yeas and nays on the question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The "ayes" have it.

Mr. MYERS. Then I withdraw my motion.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1062) relating to the duties of registers of United States land offices and the publication in newspapers of official land-office notices.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has previously had this bill under consideration as in Committee of the Whole. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to state the amendment which was offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has been advised that that amendment has already been acted upon and has been rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] was interested in this bill and desired to speak upon it.

Mr. MYERS. May I interrupt the Senator for a minute? I can clear all that up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. MYERS. On the last day when that bill was considered—the Senator from Utah was not here—the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] was put to a vote and defeated.

I asked the Senator from New Mexico on the floor if he would oppose the further consideration of the bill, even in his absence, or if he had any objection to its being considered in his absence, and he repeatedly stated, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, in the very plainest and strongest possible terms, that he waived all objection and had no objection to its coming up at any time hereafter, either in his absence or otherwise. That is all in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and is a matter of public record. It all occurred right here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that I have no objection to the bill personally, but——

Mr. MYERS. I was satisfied that the Senator would not object personally.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do know that the Senator from New Mexico asked me not to allow the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MYERS. That is all done away with. I call the Senator's attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 3d day of June, 1916. He will find the whole thing set forth there, and the disclaimer of the Senator from New Mexico of a desire for any further delay.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take what the Senator from Montana says as being the fact.

Mr. MYERS. I am very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Therefore I shall not offer any further objection to the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT JUDGES.

The bill (S. 706) to amend section 260 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over on objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill without regard to the objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we will have to lay aside the bill at 2 o'clock, and there are only two minutes left. It would take that time to call the yeas and nays, so——

Mr. SMOOT. We might as well call them, because we want a quorum here when we take up the bill, anyhow.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will renew this motion to-morrow morning.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Me.	Phelan	Smoot
Brady	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Sterling
Bryan	Jones	Poindexter	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Clapp	Lane	Ransdell	Townsend
Culberson	McLean	Reed	Walsh
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Shafroth	Warren
Fletcher	Myers	Sheppard	Williams
Harding	Newlands	Sherman	Works
Hardwick	Norris	Simmons
Husting	Overman	Smith, Ga.
James	Page	Smith, Md.

Mr. CUMMINS. My colleague [Mr. KENYON] is absent from the city on account of severe illness in his family. I make this announcement for the day.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TAGGART]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is unavoidably absent on official business and also that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is likewise absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators and Mr. O'GORMAN, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. LEE of Maryland, Mr. BORAH, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, and Mr. SWANSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13383) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments; agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. LEA of Tennessee, and Mr. JONES conferees on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 10484, the Post Office appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10484) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. Just before adjournment last evening an amendment was made to the pending amendment in the first line, the intention of which was to limit the application of the amendment to railways. In order to make the amendment consistent, there will have to be a slight change in the phraseology in other parts of the amendment. So I ask to perfect my amendment by inserting, after the word "matter," in line 1, page 2, the words "by railway common carriers"; also by inserting, in line 9, page 2, after the word "all," the word "railway"; also by inserting, after the word "any," in line 12, page 3, the word "such," and by inserting, in line 21, after the word "any," the word "such."

These changes will make the amendment apply only to railway mail common carriers, and I take the privilege of modifying the amendment accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the modification will be made.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I concur most heartily in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa. I think this change ought to have been made years ago. I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission as a quasi-judicial body acting as the instrumentality of Congress in the regulation of interstate commerce should be called upon to determine all questions relating to the charges of carriers whether to individuals or to the public itself. It is the only fair way of regulating railway carriers and regulating the pay that is to be paid to the railway carriers for carrying the mail. Congress organized this tribunal for the purpose of determining such questions, and there seems to be no reason why it should not submit the question of railway-mail pay as it has all other questions relating to the compensation of carriers to this tribunal of its own creation.

Mr. President, I shall not dwell further on that subject for I believe it is the sense of the Senate that that amendment should be adopted.

I will bring up again the matter which I brought up this morning relating to the contemplated strike by a portion of the employees of the railroads of the country, some 300,000 in number, who are employed now upon freight trains, and constituting, I believe, about one-fifth of all the railway employees. I offered this morning a resolution which had been framed by the National Chamber of Commerce after a referendum address to all the member bodies some weeks ago, and which was almost unanimously indorsed by those bodies.

I asked this morning to have inserted in the RECORD a few pages from their report upon this matter containing the reasons for their support of the resolution and giving an outline of arguments in favor of the committee's report and another outline of arguments against the committee's report. The whole matter seems to have been very fairly considered by this chamber of commerce in the public interest, and without any expression as to the merits of the controversy, but simply as to the desirability of having this question settled without a lockup of transportation such as is threatened. The insertion in the RECORD was objected to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I saw them afterwards and they told me they had no objection to its insertion, and I will ask leave to insert these pages from the report of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in connection with my remarks during the morning hour.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator of course can put the document which he has in his hand into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by reading it, but I object most emphatically to its going into the RECORD except it be read in. I can not make objection to that. If I could I would, because I understand exactly what this Chamber of Commerce of the United States is doing. It is taking the place of the old and discredited associations of manufacturers of the United States. It sent out one of these prepared arguments for and against the seamen's bill some months ago to the local chambers of commerce throughout the country. It was a most partisan presentation of the subject.

I have not examined the document which the Senator from Nevada has in his hand, but if the arguments pro and con on the seamen's bill is any measure of the fairness of the arguments presented on this measure, then, Mr. President, the votes of the various local chambers of commerce of the country, based upon what was presented to them, would be entirely misleading as a record of fair public opinion.

Of course, the only purpose in submitting this document is to influence the action of Congress, and any Senator can readily understand that the crux of the whole matter is the fairness of the presentation of both sides.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, meeting here in Washington from time to time, takes up public questions, and for the purpose of influencing public opinion it prepares a statement on one side and a statement upon the other side of questions of importance. Then it sends out those statements to the chambers of commerce of the different cities of the country, and upon the presentation made by this chamber of commerce the various local bodies vote for or against the measure.

Anyone can readily see, Mr. President, that the action of the local chambers of commerce over the United States will depend entirely upon how this question is presented to them, whether it be presented faithfully, whether it presents all the arguments upon both sides. So that gets to be the kernel, the marrow, of the whole business; and the only purpose of taking this census of the local chambers of commerce and the only purpose of putting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is to influence congressional action.

So, Mr. President, knowing that in one instance at least the chambers of commerce of the United States acted in the interest of the Shipping Trust of this country and secured a condemnation of the seamen's bill which gave freedom to the seamen of this country and which is helping more than any one other one act, more than subsidies can help to build up an American merchant marine—knowing, sir, that they secured by a partisan and biased statement of the seamen's bill a condemnation of it from these local chambers of commerce, I am suspicious of their action here.

I suppose I am trespassing upon the patience of the Senator from Nevada, who has the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am very glad to hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And probably I am trespassing upon the patience of the Senate; but I have a good deal within me which I am going to present at an opportune time on this question of the increase in the wages of the trainmen of the country.

Mr. President, I look with a good deal of suspicion upon anything that might be used to muzzle and handicap the men who run the trains on railroads in this great country of ours from securing a limitation of their hours of service to eight hours.

It fell to me to present to the Congress of the United States the first limitation that was ever put by law upon the hours that these trainmen can be compelled to work. I fought on this floor for days to get the consideration of a bill limiting the work hours of these men.

I sometimes feel almost ashamed, Mr. President, that I ever stood here to put a 16-hour limitation upon that service; but at the time the records in the Interstate Commerce Commission showed that engineers, conductors, and train crews were being compelled to run from 30 to 70 and even 100 hours without a moment's rest. The columns of the papers of this country were filled with accounts of accidents and the slaughter of innocent people. I did not mean to go into this at all, but, Mr. President, influences were strong enough on this floor in the interest of the railroads, so that when I presented the proposition 10 years ago to limit the hours of service to 16 hours it required days and days of effort to secure consideration for the bill. Senators would appear on this floor, respond to a roll call on a quorum call, and retire almost in a body to the cloakrooms, so that when the vote was taken upon the question of taking the bill up for consideration a quorum would not vote. I can cite Senators to that record. It is one of the black pages in the history of the Senate. Again and again was that thing repeated here, Senators running back into the cloakrooms to break a quorum, so that the bill could not even be considered, and then returning to answer to their names when the roll was called to determine whether a quorum was present or not. Finally by persistence there was wrested from this body an agreement to consider the bill at the next session and to vote upon it, and of course when it came to a vote nobody dared go on record against it. It passed overwhelmingly, and a limitation was put upon the work hours of train crews of this country of 16 hours. It has been partly observed and it has been often violated by the railroads.

Now, the men who sit in the cramped positions in engine cabs, with their hands on the throttle, every faculty concentrated, every nerve tense for eight hours, on whom depend the lives of the people who are being transported by the trains, are contending for a limitation of eight hours' continued service.

Mr. President, those men ask for an eight-hour limitation. It is a reasonable limitation. All the scientific investigations made in this country with respect to accidents, not only on railroads but in all places where dangerous machinery is used, is to the effect that as the wear and tear and concentration of mind and of muscle and of nerve begin to tell upon the man accidents begin to multiply. In any factory in the United States where the strain is prolonged, if you take the time schedule of accidents, you will find the accidents multiply enormously late in the day. So it is with these trainmen.

Mr. President, of course the engineers and the conductors are pretty well paid, as compared with some employments, but it is to be remembered that they serve under exceptional conditions. I do not know of many men who are employed on a wage scale in this country upon whom such a responsibility rests as upon the engineers and the conductors and the trainmen. I do not know of many men who serve in employments that are hazardous who break down so early in life as do these men, more especially, perhaps, the engineers, sitting hour after hour in a cramped and strained position, taking the hard jars that they must take of the engine, with all its weight, as it thunders over the rails. Mr. President, I do not know of any set of men in this country who relatively suffer to so great an extent loss of life and horrible bodily mutilation in accidents as do these men.

The referendum vote taken by the chamber of commerce and set forth in the document proposed to be inserted in the RECORD is based upon a statement very ingeniously contrived to show that engineers receive more in wages than some men who are not employed in such hazardous and exacting service, but not taking into account the limitation of their life of effective service; not taking into consideration the strain, exactions, and concentration required in that service; and not taking into consideration the fact that they are compelled to give up the home life, that they have to live on the road, that they have to meet expenses that men differently employed do not have to meet.

I might occupy the attention of the Senate for a considerable period in reciting the differences between the exactions made of these trainmen and those with whom this document, from the little that I glean from its reading, would make comparison. I merely suggest that, Mr. President, without going into details; but the difference between the statement set forth in the document and the just demands of these trainmen which are not presented in the document, and which were not considered and were not suggested for the consideration of the various boards of trade of the country, in a measure will tend to show how imperfect and how short of meeting the fair requirements of a justly argued proposition upon both sides is this method of submitting a referendum to the boards of trade of the United States and using the result in an effort to influence the action of Congress.

Mr. President, I can not stop the document from going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but, in this imperfect and far from exhaustive statement, I have set out some things which I think may tend in a measure to balance the effect of its publication in the RECORD.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin complains that upon a similar referendum made by the National Chamber of Commerce regarding the shipping bill a prejudiced and unfair statement of the facts was made with a view to influencing public opinion, and particularly the action of the constituent chambers of commerce of the National Chamber of Commerce. I know nothing of that controversy; I never saw the document constituting that referendum; and it is impossible for me to make any answer regarding it. I can only say that I believe that every respectable organization in the United States that seeks to mold public opinion upon any subject is entitled to a hearing, and that a national chamber of commerce, composed of the representatives of all of the boards of trade and chambers of commerce in the country, is, by reason of its intimate connection with the business and transportation of the country, entitled to be heard upon a subject so important as that of transportation, the tying up of which involves also the tying up of the commerce of the entire country. I think it is quite proper that such an organization should give consideration to such an important question, and that it is quite right that it should present its views respectfully to the Congress of the United States upon the subject. Other organizations are entitled to the same hearing. It is only by discussion that a sound public opinion can be formed.

I am aware that chambers of commerce are sometimes subjected to attacks in legislative bodies as representing selfish interests and of seeking to impress upon legislation such selfish interests. I have no doubt the charge is sometimes, perhaps often, true; and yet that fact would not prevent me from presenting to the Congress of the United States an expression of opinion by such a body, any more than some discreditable things that are said with reference to labor organizations and the terrorism which they inspire would prevent me from presenting their views and conclusions for the consideration of Congress. In presenting such views I do not indorse them.

What, however, is the matter which the National Chamber of Commerce has had under consideration? The question as to whether it is proper or humane to establish an eight-hour day? No; they do not pretend to enter into that inquiry. Let me say that, so far as my individual views are concerned, I have always been for an eight-hour law, and I have voted gradually to extend it wherever I had the opportunity; for I believe that eight hours is a sufficient time for a man to work in any matter involving the labor of the hands. The question which this National Chamber of Commerce is considering is the possible effect of a tie-up of transportation; and they are seeking to avert that tie-up by having a quasi-judicial inquiry made as to all the facts that relate to the employment of labor by the great common carriers of the country.

Thus far we know that only a part of the labor employed by common carriers—less than a third, I believe—has been able by concerted action to secure from their employers recognition of their just claims, and that outside of them stand over a million of unorganized laborers, who thus far have been unable to present in any concrete form their demands.

This is becoming a very important question, first, as to whether these increases are being proportionately distributed among all the laborers of the railroads instead of being apportioned only to a favored portion. The National Chamber of Commerce wishes an inquiry to be made with reference to all labor. They doubtless realize, as every business man realizes to-day, that, as a result of a constant increase in taxes, of a constant increase in wages, of a constant increase in the cost of supplies, the expenses of the railway carriers are increasing. If their income increases in the same proportion, it will have no effect upon dividends; but if the increase in income does not keep pace with the increase in these various operating expenses—the increase in the cost of supplies, the increase in the cost of interest paid, and so forth—then it must have an effect upon dividends. Well, many say these dividends have been swollen and that they ought to be reduced. That may be so; and yet to my knowledge we have had no judicial or quasi-judicial inquiry as to that fact. I dare say it is so with reference to some railways, and that it is not so with reference to others.

There is a commission organized with a view to determining such questions, but it never has started upon such a general inquiry. That commission is the Interstate Commerce Commission. We all know, however, that, as a result of the constant increase in fixed charges and in operating expenses, it has been much more difficult of late for the railways to get money for development and improvement than it has been in the past.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. As a practical proposition, in view of the tremendous amount of work which now devolves upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in view of the fact that we are daily or weekly passing provisions here, such as are found in the pending Post Office appropriation bill, imposing upon them other great burdens, how long would it take the Interstate Commerce Commission to make this proposed investigation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should say it would take them a couple of months to do so.

Mr. BORAH. I had supposed it would take five or six months.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It might take more than a couple of months. I can not say. But, at all events, it is an investigation which should be made.

Mr. BORAH. But the thought occurred to me——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to say that as a practical proposition the thought had occurred to me that there ought to be some way by which to make the investigation, if it is going to be made, within such time as the men who are in the employment of railroad companies could afford to give to the investigation. They would not want to have it turned over to a body whose duties forbid them investigating it within any reasonable length of time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I may say that there will come up before the Interstate Commerce Committee, when the joint resolution is referred to it, the question as to whether the Interstate Commerce Commission shall make this inquiry, or whether some special commission shall make it, or whether the Board of Mediation and Conciliation shall make it, or whether Congress through a special committee shall make it. That is a mere matter of method, but there is no doubt that the inquiry must at some time be made.

We can perhaps endure it if the railways themselves are the only sufferers, if the stockholders are the only sufferers; but if there is a reflected injury to the entire public, arising out of the fact that railway building is stayed and railway development and improvement are checked by reason of these conditions, the public and the entire commerce of the country suffer.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator if the law which was enacted a year or two ago, largely at the instance of the Senator from Nevada, does not make it the duty of the Board of Mediation and Conciliation to act in such cases as the one which has now arisen? Is it not now the duty of that board to offer its services and to take the proper steps to investigate this controversy, which threatens the prosperity of the country?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It is the duty of the board, and, as I understand, that board has already been at work between the contending parties; and one of the contending parties, the railroads themselves, has made an unconditional refusal to consider the question of this increase. How much further the Board of Mediation is going I do not know.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will it not simply result in confusion to institute independent proceedings by another commission already overburdened with work, when the law provides that the Board of Mediation and Conciliation is the proper body to carry on the investigation and to act as intermediaries?

Mr. NEWLANDS. That may be so, Mr. President, and the Committee on Interstate Commerce may so conclude. I am not prepared to say to-day that I shall vote for this resolution; but I thought it well to introduce it as a starting point for investigation by the Interstate Commerce Committee, with a view to determining, first, whether now is the time to legislate upon the subject at all, and, second, if so, through what agency.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the bill known as the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought it was the request made by the Senator from Nevada for the insertion of certain matter in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was objected to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. It will be necessary for me to read that matter, inasmuch as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has objected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Was there objection made, I ask?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was objection made to the insertion of the matter without reading.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to appeal to the Senator from Nevada, who is eminently a just man, and ask him whether he thinks it is quite fair to interject this discussion, which is entirely removed from the amendment which is the pending question, into the debate on the amendment which I have offered? I do not underrate the importance of the matter to which the Senator from Nevada is addressing himself, but will there not be a more appropriate time for the consideration of the subject which he is now presenting?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I had no expectation when I brought this matter up that it would take so much time. I had no idea that any objection would be interposed to the insertion of this matter in the RECORD, as the objections made this morning have been disposed of, but the Senator from Wisconsin has objected.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the Senator if the only objection that has been made to the insertion of the matter was the objection made this morning?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Oh, no.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I am deeply impressed with the necessity of expediting the business of this Chamber, and, in order to save time and to enable the Senate to proceed with its business in order, I will withdraw the objection, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a subsequent objection was made to the insertion of this matter in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is only fair to myself now that I should go on and read this statement. If it were the prejudiced statement which the Senator from Wisconsin suspects, I might be under criticism for intruding it upon the attention of Congress, but I wish to put it in the RECORD, so that the Senate can judge for itself. I will read from it; it is not long:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE RAILROAD SITUATION.

APRIL 10, 1916.

TO THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES:

The railroad committee, whose appointment was authorized by the chamber of commerce at its annual meeting in February, 1916, having painstakingly pursued its inquiry into the subject assigned to it, begs leave to submit the following report:

Your committee is profoundly impressed with the gravity of the existing situation and with the importance of having the people of the United States realize how seriously every interest will be affected by the threatened interruption of railroad traffic.

Your committee is also convinced that, notwithstanding the burdens at present resting upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, there is no more important service which the commission could undertake in the public interest than that hereafter proposed, nor is there any other existing agency which enjoys the confidence of the men, the railroads, and the public, and is in every respect qualified to conduct an accurate and impartial investigation of the questions involved in the present controversy.

Your committee therefore recommends that the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States take steps to secure immediately by referendum a vote from its constituent members approving the introduction into the Senate and the House of Representatives of a joint resolution, substantially as follows:

"Whereas the controversy has arisen between the railroads and certain of their employees relating to a shortening of the hours of labor without corresponding decrease in pay, and for increased compensation for any service performed in excess of the daily period prescribed, may lead to a serious interruption of the railroad service with disastrous effect upon the public welfare and upon the commerce of the Nation: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, etc., That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed immediately to investigate and to report to the Congress as soon as practicable the minimum, maximum, and average wage paid, with hours of service, to each class of railroad employees in the United States, and, so far as they are comparable, the minimum, maximum, and average wage, with hours of service, paid in other industries where similar skill and risk are involved, the relation of wages to railroad revenues, the question of whether railroad revenues based on existing rates for transportation will admit of equally favorable terms to all classes of railroad employees, and any other matter in this connection that the commission may deem relevant; and be it further

"Resolved, That is is the sense of the Congress that the railway companies, their officers, and employees should give their hearty support and cooperation to the Interstate Commerce Commission in its investigation, deferring pending controversies over questions at issue until that commission may be able to complete its investigations and make its report to the Congress.

COMMITTEE ON THE RAILROAD SITUATION,
HARRY A. WHEELER, Chairman.

OUTLINE OF ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

I. The public has a paramount interest in having before it an authoritative and nonpartisan statement of the facts regarding wages paid by the railroads to their employees; the public is a deeply interested party to any dispute between railroads and their employees, and is entitled to a clear and authoritative statement of the facts.

The United States has more than 250,000 miles of railway operated as a public utility. In dependence upon the lines of railway the agriculture, mining, manufacturing, and merchandising of the whole country have been developed in such a way that unimpaired and uninterrupted railroad service is vital to every business and every community. With the exception of the Great Lakes, no inland waterways are extensively utilized; for use even of the Great Lakes transportation by rail is ordinarily essential at either the eastern or the western terminus of the water route.

As consumers as well as in the position of producers all members of the public are interested in the operation of the railroads. In the hearings of the Five Per Cent case, decided in 1914, it was estimated that each year the railroads haul 12 tons for every person in the United States; on these 12 tons the freight charges are in the neighborhood of $23. If these estimates are correct, the annual freight bill for each head of a household is about $100.

Not only are there most important national interests in the railroads as public utilities which daily perform the services by law required of such utilities, but a large number of persons have a proprietary interest through ownership of stock and bonds. This proprietary interest, divided among hundreds of thousands of persons with little or no information regarding the details of railroad operation, can probably be estimated conservatively at $15,000,000,000; at least the most recent statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for 1912, indicate the total railway capital at $20,000,000,000, and the National Securities Commission in 1911 stated that over 20 per cent of outstanding capital was held by the railroads themselves.

The public interest in means of transportation has been emphasized by the courts. Some of the expressions of the United States Supreme Court have been: "Railroad corporations being the recipients of special privileges from the State, to be exercised in the interest of the public * * * their business is deemed affected with a public use." "A common carrier can not be exonerated from his duties by anything except the clearly expressed assent of the parties concerned." "A common carrier exercises a sort of public office, having public duties to perform from which he can not be excused without the consent of those concerned."

The public character of the railroads of the country, in which the interest of the public in uninterrupted and efficient operation is transcendent, makes it highly important that authoritative information should at once be placed before the public regarding any controversies between employers and employees out of which detriment to great national interests might come.

II. Information regarding the relations of the railroads in all respects other than with their employees is available, or is being gathered; there should be no exception with respect to the relation of employer and employee.

The Interstate Commerce Commission publishes monthly a statement of the revenues and the operating expenses of railroads which are of such a size as to have general interest. Every year it publishes for each of the important roads detailed statistics in a large volume, the preliminary abstract of which, issued in advance of the completed volume, contains for each road some 500 items ranging from the rentals received from locomotives and the expenditures for fences along the right of way to the tons of freight moved and the number of coal cars which are owned. Statistics are published to show the number of employees in train service who at any time have been on duty more than 16 consecutive hours, with an indication of the causes which led to long hours of service. Repeatedly, at the direction of Congress, investigations have been made into the finances and the management of railroads, and special reports published. Since 1913, and at a present yearly public expense of $3,000,000 or more, the original cost and the cost of reproduction new are being ascertained for all the railroads of the country.

Information which is now made available or is being assembled shows the degree of safety with which railroads are operated, the equipment with which they undertake to perform their public duties, the disposal in expenses, interest, dividends, etc., of the freight charges and passenger fares they collect, and the value of the property upon which they can ask a reasonable return through their charges to the public. Nevertheless, the wages and salaries paid to their employees and officers are made public only in gross sums and in general averages, and the public, unaccustomed to the complex form in which wages for many kinds of railroad services are customarily stated, has no means of knowing the purport of requests made for increased wages and no data by which it can compare either existing or proposed wages in railroad service with wages in other occupations.

III. In having railroad wages adequate to obtain efficient service and to return a proper compensation in view of American standards and in knowing that freight and passenger revenues are not dissipated in extravagant wages the public has a special interest because of the service it has a right to exact and the rates it pays.

The cost of operating a railroad, in which expenditures for wages form a great part, has repeatedly been held by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be a proper element for consideration when it is determining whether or not the rates charged for service to the public are reasonable; the element of cost of operation, however, is not necessarily controlling. For example, in 1912 the commission said it could not, from the point of view of public policy and humanity, ignore the wages and standard of living of railway employees or of miners when it was examining the freight rates on coal.

To the necessity of having railroads so manned and equipped as to provide adequate service the Interstate Commerce Commission has several times referred. In 1910 it said: "We must be conscious in our consideration of these rate questions of their effect upon the policy of the railroads and, ultimately, upon the welfare of the State. This country can not afford to have poor railroads, insufficiently equipped, unsubstantially built, carelessly operated." In the Five Per Cent case of 1914 the commission pointed out that the railroads "must provide a prompt and safe service, and they are held to a strict responsibility for injuries to travelers using their facilities and for losses or damage to property which they undertake to carry."

IV. The Interstate Commerce Commission is the proper body to make the investigation and the report proposed.

By law the commission now requires detailed reports from the railroads regarding their activities, revenues, and items of expenditure; the commission also has authority to require the railroads to make "specific answers to all questions upon which the commission may need information." Accordingly, the commission already has in its files much material for such a report as is proposed. It has organized and experienced staffs for investigation and for compilation of statistics, and it has power to gather from the railroads such additional information regarding wages as it may need. In 1914, when considering the Five Per Cent case, it did not hesitate to require the roads to prepare from waybills specific data concerning the corn, hay, cattle, lumber, etc., they carried in a certain month, and to go into details regarding their disposal of old wheels.

Under a Federal policy now well recognized, questions of banking and questions of railroad transportation are segregated from other questions and are referred to expert bodies. The gathering and presentation for public information of data regarding wages paid in railroad service should not be made an exception to this policy, but should be placed with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

No other independent Federal agency organized to be nonpartisan and with a record of actual abstention from partisanship is prepared to undertake the immediate investigation proposed. No new agency could be created which would command the same respect from all parts of the public or which could proceed without delay. The Interstate Commerce Commission is so well equipped to undertake the task in question that the commission would be justified, in the event it found such a course necessary, in temporarily ceasing from some of its usual activities in order that it might assume this investigation.

I will call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that then follows the outline of arguments against the committee's report, which seems to be fairly balanced.

OUTLINE OF ARGUMENT'S AGAINST THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

I. The Interstate Commerce Commission already has too much work and should not be asked to assume more duties.

Under existing law the commission has so many duties and such a volume of work that on April 17, 1916, the House of Representatives passed a bill enlarging the membership from seven to nine. In the last year for which the commission has reported, the year ending with October, 1915, it received 6,500 informal complaints, decided 902 formal cases, conducted 1,500 hearings in which 200,000 pages of testimony were taken, carried on a number of special investigations which included such important matters as the readjustment of transcontinental and intermediate rates in connection with the new route created by the Panama Canal, received and scrutinized 149,000 changes in rates filed by the railroads, and conducted the valuation of railroad properties which is in progress. Even this statement is not a complete summary of the activities of the commission, which in many respects need more of its attention rather than less.

II. Wages are connected with operation; the commission has never had jurisdiction with respect to operation, and consequently is not especially prepared for the task.

Aside from investigation into the efficiency of block signals and a limited jurisdiction in connection with the law which fixes maximum hours of consecutive duty for train-service employees and telegraphers, the commission has had little to do with the physical operation of the roads to which any question of wages is related. The ordinary jurisdiction of the commission, with respect to rates, concerns the traffic department of railroad management; the operating department is separate and distinct, with problems peculiarly its own.

III. The usefulness of the commission in performing its present duties could not be increased by the inquiry proposed, and it might be impaired.

Any attempt by a public body to make an investigation into facts which are the basis of an existing controversy, in which the public is not as yet directly a party, contains many possibilities of biased and partisan criticism. As such criticism directed against the commission in connection with the investigation proposed would not relate to its ordinary duties, the general acceptance of its conclusions in its proper sphere might be seriously impaired and public detriment result.

IV. Congress is expected to enact at this session a provision for an investigation of the conditions relating to interstate commerce and the necessity of further regulation.

The joint congressional committee which is proposed in a pending bill, introduced to follow a suggestion made by the President last December, could at once consider whether or not new agencies are needed to furnish the sort of information which it is proposed to gather, or itself might undertake to obtain and publish the data.

If Congress preferred not to leave the question of having information gathered to the joint committee, it could create a new agency, since the relation of employer and employee in the case of a public utility with 2,000,000 persons on its salary lists and pay rolls, and paying in salaries and wages yearly sums upward of a billion and a quarter dollars, may properly be considered worthy of the attention of a separate agency of the Government.

If an existing agency is to be used, the Federal Board of Mediation and Conciliation might be appropriate. Its members and staff have acquired much information and experience relating to railway wages; for this agency is maintained under special statutes for the express purpose of endeavoring to prevent disputes between railroads and their employees from interfering with the rights of the public to have unimpeded transportation facilities.

Mr. President, it strikes me that that is a fair statement of both sides of the controversy, without taking either side, except in favor of an investigation by a quasi judicial body; and surely the chamber of commerce can not be charged with lack of wisdom in recommending that the tribunal that should make this inquiry should be the tribunal which has been organized as the servant of Congress for the purpose of aiding it in the exercise of its power with reference to the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that a great public wrong will be done if the operation of the railroads is in any way interfered with. A controversy has arisen between the railroads and one-tenth of their employees, 300,000 in number, having the capacity to paralyze absolutely the transportation of the country; and they announce that they are about to determine now, by a referendum vote addressed to every one of these organizations throughout the country, the question whether their four representatives shall have the power at any moment of time to tie up and to paralyze the commerce of the country. If they have that power and are willing to exercise it, then the public is in great danger; and the question is, How can that danger be averted? By legislation which will make every employee of a common carrier a public servant, the abandonment of whose job would be an act of disloyalty to the public itself and to the Government? We are not prepared for that. The only way in which we can avert this great danger is by reason and persuasion, and reason and persuasion must be based upon facts.

What facts have we? Has there ever been any classification of the railway employees of the country, their wages, and their hours? None whatever that I know of. What effect will this proposed diminution in hours have upon the increase of the operating expenses of the railways? No one knows.

The railway employees say that it will increase those operating expenses only $20,000,000 annually. The railroads say that it will increase them $100,000,000 annually. Which one is right?

If the increase in the cost of operation of the railways is $100,000,000 annually, is that hundred million dollars to come out of the dividends of the stockholders, the profits to which they think themselves entitled, or is it to come out of the public, by reason of the imposition of increased rates?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says that the contention of the railroads in this controversy is that if the demands of the men are granted it will result in an increase of railway expenses of $100,000,000 annually. Is not that just about the amount which certain banking interests in New York City, in their manipulation of the New York & New Haven road, took from that road?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am not informed as to that.

Mr. THOMAS. And whose was the loss of that manipulation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. It should be the loss of the men who made the manipulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Unquestionably; but does it not also fall upon consumption? Now, I am not prepared to talk about this subject very much at present, but it seems to me that if the present methods of railroad manipulation are to go on, and these enormous sums are to be extracted from the railway interests, it will be quite as well to have some of it go to the men who operate these roads as to have all of it go to a small combination of men who use the credit of the railroads for the purpose of destroying them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I quite agree with the Senator that as between the money which is to go to favored stockholders by manipulation and the money that is to go to the operatives by increase of wages, I much prefer the latter. What I say, however, is that we have no accurate data upon the subject. There must be, then, an inquiry by somebody, because if we are to engage in reason and persuasion instead of a resort to absolute power over the operatives of the roads we must have the facts; and if the claims of the men are just, their demands should be granted upon those facts; and if they result in an increase of the operating expenses of the railroads, some arrangement must be made by which the railroads shall receive an income sufficient to cover these operating expenses, unless the railroads are now enjoying an income above what they are entitled to; yet we have no proof with reference to either of these questions.

I imagine that the cost of labor on these railroads must be a very large percentage of the total operating expenses; I do not know how much. The Supreme Court decision requires the Interstate Commerce Commission, in fixing the rates, to take into consideration the value of the roads, the amount of stock and bonds issued, the operating expenses, the taxes, and other considerations; and yet we have never reduced these considerations to any definite data. We do not know yet, to-day, the value of the roads. We are ascertaining it, and it will take five years longer to ascertain it. We complain that there have been overissues of stocks and bonds, but we do not know how much. But the fact remains that as a result of these uncertainties the investment in railway securities has almost ceased within the past year or two.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the Senator if he would not be willing now to postpone the remainder of his very interesting address until we can consider for a short time the matter before the Senate, the unfinished business? In that connection I desire to remind the Senator that this bill must be passed before the 1st of July, if it is possible. I hope we shall be able now to proceed to its consideration, if the Senator from Nevada will kindly consent to that course.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama has a right to complain of this intrusion. It was not my purpose to intrude so long a discussion upon this subject. I simply thought I would get this matter in the RECORD. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], however, made some remarks regarding the substance of this paper itself, and made some observations which I thought rather reflected upon me for intruding this matter at all upon the attention of Congress; and I felt that I owed it to myself to make a fair statement. I will not take more than a few moments longer. I will close in three minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. In that connection I wish to suggest that I thought the Senator from Wisconsin was mistaken in his generalship when he objected to printing this matter in the RECORD. If it had been printed in the RECORD I will almost guarantee that no Senator would have read it. Now, they have been compelled to listen to it. Therefore it has gotten some publicity.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I might observe, Mr. President, that very few of them have listened to it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, that is true of most debates in the Senate.

Mr. President, I believe that this matter ought to be looked into now by the Interstate Commerce Committee. I am not prepared to say that the action provided for by this resolution is the right action, but it seems to me that it is the time now for this committee to summon before it the chiefs of these great railway organizations and the chiefs of the railways themselves, and ask them what objection they have to an investigation of this kind, so that we will obtain the facts upon which we can base an appeal to the reason and the judgment of both the carriers and their employees. I can not but believe that such a discussion at this time will bring both sides to a realization of the fact that the public has some rights in this matter; that at a time when we are engaged in serious difficulties with a neighboring country and in diplomatic controversies with countries abroad, and when the economic conditions are such as to make everybody view with apprehension any derangement of interstate commerce, it is, above all, incumbent both upon the employers and the employees to keep their heads, to get the facts, to appeal to the reason and the judgment of the entire American people, so that public opinion will back up the proper determination of this matter.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I regret very much that my objection did not exclude from the RECORD the matter which the Senator from Nevada has taken the time to read into the RECORD. That makes it necessary for me to follow it with some facts which, I think, will supplement somewhat the side of the employees, which is very unfairly and very imperfectly stated in the matter which the Chamber of Commerce of the United States sent out to the local chambers of commerce of the country in order to get just the votes that would be satisfactory to the great railroad interests.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate, or so many of its Members as are represented here this afternoon, while I record a few facts which I think are pertinent to this subject. The purpose—I will not say the only purpose, but the effect—of the insertion in the RECORD of this matter from the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is to influence public opinion, and therefore I desire that there shall go along with it some data which will more evenly balance the matter which has been presented.

I begin, Mr. President, by reading a brief statement, published in a very unbiased magazine of the country, to which I contributed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With very great pleasure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator, with a view to sparing the feelings of my friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], whether it will suit his convenience to have the matter to which he refers inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; oh, no! I can make it so much more impressive, Mr. President, by reading it.

Mr. THOMAS. And interesting.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And much more interesting; and it is pretty well written, too, for I wrote it myself. [Laughter.] It appears in La Follette's Magazine of April, 1916:

AN EIGHT-HOUR DAY FOR TRAINMEN.

In the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress I made a long fight for a 16-hour limit as a maximum working day for trainmen. Senators opposed to the measure resorted to a protracted filibuster to defeat it. That legislation was in the interest of fairer treatment for the men and greater safety for the traveling public. Like the opposition of the steamship companies to the seamen's bill, it illustrates the blind greed of corporate monopoly in resisting every measure to secure decent and humane conditions, reasonable hours, reasonable compensation for employees, and an utter disregard for the lives of patrons whenever it interferes with profits.

The 16-hour law for trainmen afforded some small measure of relief where its provisions were observed, but it has been shamefully evaded. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, show that there were 261,332 cases where 16 hours of continuous service was exceeded by train and engine men. Each violation involves a crew of five men, hence more than a half a million were compelled to work more than 16 hours in continuous service last year. Five thousand were on duty 27 hours and 800 were forced to remain on duty in nerve-racking train service more than 65 hours continuously.

The railway employees are engaged in a public service. It is the business of the public to redress their wrongs. Reasonable working hours for trainmen lie at the foundation of safe and efficient service. It is the most fundamental basis for the slogan, "Safety first."

For the first time in history, the several railroad brotherhoods are a united organization—400,000 strong—asking for an eight-hour day and "time and a half pay" for overtime.

This is a reasonable demand. The railroads are very prosperous. Their employees are entitled to a fair share in this prosperity. The Bureau of Railway Economics, speaking for the railroads, announces that the net operating income of the railroads of the United States for November, 1915, as compared with the same months for five preceding years, increased 45 per cent.

With the increased size of engines and length of trains and the improved devices for handling freight, labor costs the railroads less now—even though they pay more wages—than it did 20 years ago. The labor cost for an engineer per ton-mile unit was one and six-sevenths times greater in 1890 than in 1913.

The railroads claim, as always, that they are entitled to all this gain, but they are not. They are public servants. The court has determined they are entitled to a fair return on the money invested.

They are receiving much more than a fair return on the money invested. They can afford to divide profits with their employees.

Nearly all the leading trades and industries have adopted the eight-hour day. When the struggle was on the employers almost universally contended, as the railroads are now contending, that the shorter day would be ruinous. But experience demonstrates that the shorter workday makes for greater efficiency and increased output of a better product. This is especially true in all occupations of continuous concentrated effort under exacting mental and physical strain.

Extra pay for overtime is conceded in most of the great lines of industry.

Some 18 railroads are now working their employees on an eight-hour basis. These roads are prosperous.

Many railroads have been wrecked in the last decade through dishonest financial operations. The New Haven is a notable example.

These roads have not suffered loss through shorter hours or better pay of employees.

A thorough reorganization of railroad operation upon the sound basis of a sufficient force of men to handle the business within a reasonable working day, will make for higher efficiency, greater safety, and less delay in train operation.

An eight-hour statute, with extra pay for overtime, will make the law self-enforcing.

The railroads are circularizing the farmers, arguing that because farm labor is performed with no limit to the hours of service, railway employees require no statutory protection.

This is a cunning appeal. But the farmer will not be caught by it. He knows that the elementary reason for limited hours of service lies in the character of the service. The trainmen are employed in a business of great hazard, severely exacting in the draft which it makes upon certain mental and physical functions. The engineer, confined to a space scarce larger than a coffin, grasping throttle and lever, his eyes fixed upon the track ahead, mind and senses alert, concentrated for hours without relaxation or change, exhausts his vital forces in less than half the time that they would be overtaxed by another occupation where the conditions are wholly different. So, in a measure, with the firemen, conductors, and brakemen in their respective lines of labors and responsibility.

The companies also contrast the wages of the railway employees with the amount paid for farm labor. But the farmer knows that he feeds and houses his farm hands, while the railway employee must pay rent and maintain his home, besides buying all his own meals in the eating houses and railway hotels along the run, making heavy inroads upon his earnings every month.

And finally the farmer understands, as the public does generally, that better pay for 400,000 railroad employees means better homes for their families, better opportunities for their children, and, indirectly, a measure of increased prosperity well distributed over the country.

The demands of this body of 400,000 industrious, efficient, intelligent men should be granted without contest. The great masses of the people are behind them.

The facts here presented bear upon the statement and the observations submitted by the Senator from Nevada as to whether or not the railroads were sufficiently prosperous to meet this demand of their employees. I say, in this editorial:

This is a reasonable demand. The railroads are very prosperous. Their employees are entitled to a fair share in this prosperity.

I do not know that Senators are aware of the fact that some years ago the railroads of the country established here in Washington an organization, very strongly equipped with statisticians and economists, known as the Bureau of Railway Economics. They issue bulletins from time to time, presenting statistics which will support railway contentions for increased transportation charges upon the people of this country. They are very watchful. They have drawn into their service some of the ablest economists of the country, some men who have made reputations as writers and as authors of works upon the public side of railway control, who have been weaned from their earlier devotion to public interest to enlist in the better-paid service of these corporations.

There is, Mr. President, no organization, no bureau of information, no aggregation of economists and statisticians issuing matter from month to month for the protection of the public, presenting the side of the shipper and the consumer, but here in this Capital City of our Nation is builded up a powerful railroad organization that presents a lopsided statement of facts and statistics to influence not only public opinion and Congress but for the effect that it shall have upon the very tribunal which the Senator from Nevada would make the arbiter in this contest between the railway employees and the railroads of the country.

Now, I am going to quote just a word from this Bureau of Railway Economics as to the profits of the railroads of the country:

The Bureau of Railway Economics, speaking for the railroads, announces that the net operating income of the railroads of the United States for November, 1915, as compared with the same month for five preceding years, increased 45 per cent.

Do Senators get that? In 1910 the railroads of this country applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for an advance in rates, particularly in western territory. There was a prolonged investigation. The Interstate Commerce Commission of that time was the strongest, I believe, and I think it is the consensus of opinion that it was then the strongest that it has been in its history, unless it be compared with the commission as originally organized. After a most thorough and comprehensive investigation, the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1910 rendered a decision covering an enormous field of traffic in this country, denying any advance in rates and ruling that the railroads were receiving all that they were entitled to. November, 1910, is one of the five months embraced within the five-year period covered by the Bureau of Railway Economics which I have just read. Some of the other years, if not all of them—and I think all of them except one—recorded the highest net earnings of the railroads of this country of any years since the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

So, Mr. President, that statement of the Bureau of Railway Economics boasts that the net income of the railroads of the United States for November, 1915, as compared with the same months for five preceding years, showed an increase of 45 per cent in net earnings.

If November, 1915, was 45 per cent better in net earnings than November, 1910, then it is fair to assume that the whole year of 1915 was very much better than the whole year of 1910. Yet when the railroads attempted to raise their rates in 1910 the Interstate Commerce Commission denied their application on the ground that they were earning enough. If they were earning enough in 1910, how about their earnings in 1915, when their own bureau states that they were 45 per cent above the average of the same months for five years preceding?

Mr. President, it is true that the railroads in what is known as official classification territory, seizing upon an extraordinary situation late in 1914, made their application for an increase in railway rates from the Interstate Commerce Commission and secured from that commission an advance in rates. I have been reluctant, sir, to comment upon that decision on this floor, a decision in what is known as the Five Per Cent Advance Rate case.

I have regarded it for many years, sir, as important, if possible, that the Interstate Commerce Commission should hold the confidence of the people of this country as an unbiased and unprejudiced body before whom these great issues might be tried out. But, sir, when it is made necessary I am bound to say that the decision rendered by the commission in that case has made me reluctant to submit to the Interstate Commerce Commission any more propositions or questions of importance than the law brings before them in the ordinary course of its administration.

I was a member of the House of Representatives when the original Interstate Commerce Commission act was passed. I supported as best I could by voice and vote the enactment of that law. I have given many years of my life to the study of the problems involved in railway transportation. I have in some measure been instrumental in building up in one of the States of this Union the most thoroughly scientific regulation of transportation by a commission that any organized Government in the world can exhibit. Here and elsewhere, for many years, I have been a supporter and defender of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

But, Mr. President, we have witnessed changes in the commission and changes in its decisions since it denied the application of the railroads to advance rates in 1910.

The so-called Five Per Cent Rate case of 1913 and 1914, in which the railroads finally succeeded in getting a favorable decision from the Interstate Commerce Commission, is a notable instance of the change which has come. Since that time there have been many other advances in rates.

The Five Per Cent Rate case was instituted before the commission in May, 1913.

It was thoroughly investigated by the commission. Mr. Brandeis was employed to assist in the work. More than a year was given in preparation and trial of the case.

It was then decided against the railroads on July 29, 1914.

Some time thereafter the commission reopened the case, upon the application of the railroads, and decided it in their favor December 15, 1914, by a divided commission.

While this case was before the commission, the railroads organized a nation-wide conspiracy to influence the commission to decide the case in its favor.

It had its inception at a meeting of railroad presidents held April 30, 1913, just two weeks before the application for an advance in rates was filed with the commission.

They established bureaus in Philadelphia and elsewhere from which they supplied false and misleading material for publication in newspapers throughout the country.

They enlisted the services of bankers' associations, the chambers of commerce of the country, commercial clubs, and merchants and manufacturers' associations to pass and forward resolutions addressed to the Interstate Commerce Commission, making special, partisan pleas in support of an increase in rates for the railroads.

Inspired by the railroads, thousands of personal letters and telegrams were written and sent by influential business men to members of the commission, to pursuade or drive them to decide the case for the railroads.

Through the insidious and powerful influence of the railroads the metropolitan press, the magazines, and the weekly papers were induced to print articles and editorials—in all, something like 22,000—to coerce the judgment of the commission in favor of a decision increasing rates, and prepare the public mind to accept such a result without revolt.

The mail of the Interstate Commerce Commission was loaded down with marked copies of these articles and editorials.

In the hope that an exposure of the iniquitous proceeding might afford some protection to the commission and the public against its continuance in this case, I introduced and secured the passage of a Senate resolution calling upon the commission to transmit all such communications received up to that time to the Senate.

Senators who were then present will remember that I addressed the Senate upon the subject of the organized campaign which was being systematically conducted by the railroads through such means to influence a decision in their favor by the commission. I laid a great mass of the letters, telegrams, editorials, magazine articles, resolutions, and marked press clippings before the Senate; and, in order that the public might be fully advised of the great wrong, printed the material in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It covered 358 pages of the RECORD.

The law makes it the duty of the commission to require proof before increasing rates. The law presumes that the existing rates are high enough. It requires specific evidence establishing the fact that any rate or rates are so low as to be unjust and unreasonable before the commission is warranted in making an order to increase such rates. To increase the rates without the specific proof, to permit fear or favor to influence a decision, is to violate the law which the commission is chosen to administer.

Mr. President, it was a body blow to railway regulation when the Interstate Commerce Commission reversed the decision which it had rendered July 29, 1914, denying the application for an increase in rates and granted the increase in rates on the 15th of December, 1914.

Mr. President, railroad regulation by commission has had no better friend, if I say it myself, on this floor or anywhere in this country than I have been. Throughout my public life I have advocated railway regulation by a commission clothed with power not only to regulate railway rates but to be so thoroughly and so scientifically informed that it could intelligently pass upon all questions affecting rates and service.

Sir, when I entered the Senate of the United States, January, 1906, the law regulating interstate commerce required the commission to ascertain and fix reasonable rates, but there was nowhere in the law any measure of reasonable rates, or any means provided by or through which the commission could ascertain a reasonable rate.

Upon what must a reasonable rate be based? Upon first the cost of operation; second, the cost of maintenance; and third, a fair valuation of the property. The interstate commerce act of 1887 provided that the commission should be informed as to the cost of operation, and as to the cost of maintenance. But the law withheld, and every time the law was revised Congress carefully withheld from the Interstate Commerce Commission the most important element essential in ascertaining a reasonable rate, namely, the fair value of the property. It is no more possible to determine a reasonable rate which the railroads should be permitted to charge, than to determine what would be a fair profit for a manufacturing business to pay without knowing the amount of capital invested in the business. Mr. President, when I entered the Senate and proposed that the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized to secure the value of the railroads of the country, Senators rebuked me by leaving the Chamber in a body. I pressed the subject upon the attention of the Senate at every opportunity from 1906 until 1913. Finally in March, 1913, with an organized public opinion behind it, the bill for the valuation of the railway property of the country passed the Senate without a dissenting vote.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is at present engaged in the great undertaking committed to them by that bill. The time of the commission is fully occupied with its regular duties to which is added the burden of ascertaining the value of railway property. No special investigation should be referred to them by Congress at this time. There is no rational basis for them to find a true economic answer to rates or wages until they determine the fair value of railroad property.

Mr. GORE. There is no sea level.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My epigrammatic friend from Oklahoma suggests that there is no sea level to measure by. Of course there is not.

You may send this proposition, I will say to the Senator from Nevada, as to what the railroads can afford to pay in wages to the men who operate their trains, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the commission have no data from which they can determine the profit of the railroads. They guess at every question submitted to them.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether it does not follow from his reasoning that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought never, during this entire period, to have made either an increase or a reduction in rates?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it follows from my reasoning that the Interstate Commerce Commission never had any accurate scientific data from which to determine whether a rate per se was a reasonable rate. All they could do was to measure any rate that was questioned by the rates that the railroads were fixing for other hauls like in distance and character and make the best guess they could as to whether the rates were relatively equal. They never had, and the Senator must know that they never had, the information upon which to determine whether the rates were reasonable in fact or not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I will say with reference to that that I have always concurred in the view so insistently advocated by the Senator from Wisconsin that a valuation of all our railways was essential in order to enable the Interstate Commerce Commission to perform its functions. All I can say is that if the Interstate Commerce Commission has not during this intervening period had the data upon which it could fix an increased rate it has not had the data upon which it could fix a reduction of rate, and hence it follows logically that no action whatever should have been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission during this period. I admit the difficulties under which the Interstate Commerce Commission has operated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Nevada so early and so insistently contended that the valuation of the railroads was an essential to the determination of reasonable rates, it might be asked by some student of his record why he, as a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee, failed to demand legislation for railway valuation. The Interstate Commerce Commission was declaring in every annual report which it made from 1903 down to 1913 that it was impossible for them to fix reasonable rates without first ascertaining the value of the railroad property, and appealing in each of those reports in 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, and on down through the years for authority from Congress to get the valuation of the railway property of the country.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that I do not recall a time during the time that I have been a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee when I have not favored and advocated a valuation of the railroads.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD does not show that the Senator from Nevada ever raised his voice in favor of the valuation of the railways of the country until after 1906, when I made a two days' appeal on this floor for railway valuation. In 1903 the Interstate Commerce Commission appealed in its report to Congress for power and for an appropriation upon which to get the value of the railroads of the country, saying that they could not fix a reasonable rate without it. In 1904 they repeated it, in 1905 they repeated it again, in 1906 they repeated it again; and then in 1906 the Interstate Commerce Committee, of which the Senator from Nevada was a member, reported out a bill which omitted that great fundamental requirement for railroad valuation for which the Interstate Commerce Commission had pleaded with Congress from 1903. Those are historical facts.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator state when he entered the Senate?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I entered the Senate on the 4th day of January, 1906. I was sworn in on that day.

Mr. NEWLANDS. All I can say is that I certainly gave very hearty support to the Senator's measure and that prior to that time whatever bills were presented were presented not by the present party in power but by the opposite party.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but in 1906——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Now, I can not recall whether or not I moved any amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can.

Mr. NEWLANDS. But the Senator is certainly very unfair in indicating that I have not been always uniformly for the valuation of the railways.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not say the Senator was opposed to it. I say the record of his committee and the record of Congress does not show, and he can not show, that he ever supported it prior to 1906. When I advanced it in 1906 on this floor the Senator was particularly solicitous to know what it was going to do to the people who had invested in railroad securities.

I said in answer to the Senator at that time it did not make much difference to me; that they bought as they would buy any other speculative property, under the rule of caveat emptor; that it was their business to know the value of the securities in which they invested; and that the Government was not obligated to insure to speculative investors in railroad securities a profit at the unjust expense of the people of this country.

Mr. LEWIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I was attracted by the statement of the Senator calling attention to the 5 per cent increase, and subsequently to an additional increase of rate ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission within the last year and the year before. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin if his attention has been attracted in the last few days to a report emanating, or charged to come, from the Interstate Commerce Commission showing that the railroads have made $1,000,000,000——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have seen that.

Mr. LEWIS. In one year.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have seen it.

Mr. LEWIS. If such is approximately true, upon what basis of justification can it be urged that there was any necessity for the increase to which he referred, which was granted by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for his interruption. It but emphasizes what I say. There was no justification for that increase. It was made upon a spurious showing. No man need to do more than read the briefs of the attorneys upon both sides and the testimony to be convinced of that.

Two of the strongest members of that commission dissented from the increase, Mr. Chairman Harlan and Mr. Commissioner Clements, both of them saying what no living man can dispute, that in granting the increase the majority of the commission violated the law of their organization; that the law which created it empowered the commission to advance rates or to decrease rates only upon a convincing showing that the existing rate was unreasonable; that it was either too high and should be reduced or too low and should be increased. The two members of the commission who dissented from that opinion stated in their dissenting opinions that there was no testimony before the commission and no evidence taken by the commission tending to show that a single one of the great body of rates that were advanced was unreasonable at the time.

The commission introduced into the opinion which they rendered, speculations about the effect of the European war upon railway securities, that interest rates might be advanced. They wrote into that opinion considerations which Congress might properly take into account as a legislative policy in dealing with problems induced by the European war. But, sir, it is the function of the Interstate Commerce Commission to administer the law under the rules prescribed in the act which gave it being. It is never the province of an administrative commission to declare a legislative policy of government.

The reason why Congress fixed the rule for the Interstate Commerce Commission that rates should be reasonable was because Congress could not delegate to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right by its decisions to determine a legislative policy. That is what they did in that decision. They decided that because a great world war was creating a disturbance in transportation, and might affect interest rates on railroad securities, that the Government of the United States ought to guarantee railroads a certain profit on their business. Of course, other lines of business were likewise temporarily suffering inconvenience and loss. And other lines of business had to meet the conditions without Government aid. But the commission decided to protect the railroads at the expense of the people.

The law did not give them that power and there is no justification for their action.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I think it ought to be stated with reference to the decision to which he has just referred, and which was rendered upon the record made up in the proceedings of 1913, which took into account the revenues of the railway companies at their low point, that the aggregate revenues of all the railways then under consideration were sufficient after paying the cost of maintenance, operation, taxes, all fixed charges, including interest upon bonds, to pay 8.2 per cent upon the common stock of all these railways; and it was that earning which the commission held to be inadequate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, the commission did not in the first decision hold the earnings of the railroads to be inadequate. It decided against the increase for which the railroads applied. Then, when the war came on, the railroads applied for a rehearing of the case, and upon the rehearing the increase of which I have just been speaking was granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true, Mr. President; but I simply wanted it to appear in the RECORD at this point that the revenues as a whole were shown to be sufficient to pay 8.2 per cent upon the common stock of all the railways, and I never could understand how anyone could reach the conclusion that under such earnings the rates as a whole ought to be advanced.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Iowa may be correct in his figures, as based upon the brief of Mr. Thorne, but as based upon the findings of the commission it is not my recollection that the findings of the commission are in agreement with the figures which are given by the Senator. It was, however, apparent, Mr. President, as I now remember, that there was some evidence that the small areas, described as "central classification territory"——

Mr. CUMMINS. Western freight association territory.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I mean the small areas within the official classification territory, known as "central classification territory."

Mr. CUMMINS. That is in the official classification territory.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I rose to ask the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the earnings of what year he referred in the statement which he made. I might suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] that the attorney of the Interstate Commerce Commission, notwithstanding this $100,000,000 to which he has just referred, I understand, reported that he thought that the rate ought to be increased.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts voted against the confirmation of L. D. Brandeis upon any such flimsy pretext as that, he voted without any evidence upon which to rest his vote. Brandeis, as the attorney for the Interstate Commission, contended from first to last that, while in order to adjust the rates and to equalize them, certain passenger rates in "central classification territory" ought to be advanced, if they would cut off the free services the railroads would not need any additional revenue.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that was not the reason I voted against Mr. Brandeis. There were other reasons which seemed to me to be sufficient.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And which perhaps were no better.

Mr. WEEKS. However, in order to correct the record and to have the record complete, I want to ask the Senator from Iowa to what year he was referring?

Mr. CUMMINS. I referred principally to the year 1913. This proceeding was begun early in 1913. The original decision was rendered, I think, in June, 1914.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was rendered July 29, 1914.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was rendered in July, 1914. A rehearing was applied for shortly thereafter, and the decision upon the rehearing occurred probably some time in July or August.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no. The declaration of war in Europe in 1914 came on the 1st day of August, and the application for a rehearing and the decision were all after that period.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it was after the 1st of August, 1914.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was a considerable period after that time; and, as the Senator will remember, the war was referred to in the decision which was rendered.

Mr. CUMMINS. The decision upon the rehearing occurred some time, I think, in the latter part of 1914, did it not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct. The decision in favor of the railroads was rendered on December 15, 1914.

Mr. CUMMINS. And the earnings that were taken into account principally were those for 1913, supplemented by those of the early months of 1914; and those were the months of low earnings upon the part of the railway companies.

Mr. WEEKS. My recollection is that the Interstate Commerce Commission figures for the fiscal year 1914 show an earning of 4¼ per cent on the capital stock of the railroads of the United States, and I think an investigation will show that those figures are correct, as reported by the commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken about the matter, I am sure. He is now referring to all the railways in the United States.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; I am.

Mr. CUMMINS. I referred to the railways of the official classification territory, concerning whose earnings the testimony was very full and exhaustive. While I may not be correct about it, I think the Senator from Wisconsin may be in error, for I believe that the railway companies themselves admitted that the net revenues—there was some dispute about the adjustment and bookkeeping—that the net revenues of the railways in this territory would pay more than 8 per cent upon the common stock. I am not now speaking of 8 per cent upon the entire capitalization, for there was deducted from the gross earnings the rate of interest which they were actually paying upon the bonds, which represented about one-half of the entire capitalization.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What about the preferred stock?

Mr. CUMMINS. There was deducted on account of the preferred stock the rate of dividend that was actually paid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not of particular value in this discussion for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and myself to split hairs or to make fine distinctions about the rates which the railroad companies were earning upon their stock in that year. Their stock represented no investment. The stock of the railroads of the country, as a whole, have been issued without one dollar of investment represented in the issue. The railroads of this country have been built, and can be rebuilt to-day, even with the advance in the cost of material, upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] has dwelt at such length, for the bonded indebtedness of the railroads of the United States. It is the history of all railroad building, sir, that the people have furnished the capital that built the railroads. The Senator from Massachusetts shakes his head in dissent. I give this as the uniform method of railroad construction. If there be exceptions to it, my study—and it has been reasonably diligent, beginning back thirty odd years ago—has missed it.

Railroads are built in this way: A company is organized and secures a right of way. The right of way is gotten with the payment of but little money. Communities, counties, States are stimulated to believe that the building of the railroad will be a tremendous advantage to them. Their cooperation is secured in the bonding of the towns, in the bonding of the cities, in the bonding of the counties. In many cases farmers have given farm mortgages to promote the building of railroads in this country. The right of way is secured—secured by gifts, by donations. On top of it the bonds of the communities are offered.

Then, Mr. President, a construction company is organized. The construction company takes over the company that secured the right of way, and takes over all it has. Then the construction company proceeds to carry out the construction of the road in a very rough and elemental way. Then it presents to the financiers the proposition of bonding the entire enterprise. It is the history of railroading in the United States that the amount of bonds which have been issued upon each of these enterprises has been sufficient to cover all the expenses of securing the right of way, all the expenses of organization, all the expenses of agents to work upon public sentiment; every dollar of expense is included in the amount for which the property is finally bonded.

The bonds are issued, the railroad is built; and stocks are then issued, which represent no dollar of money, which go into the hands of the promoters of the enterprise as a clear gift.

Then, what follows, Mr. President? After the construction company has again passed over its organization and its titles to another organization that is finally named the railroad corporation, as it operates the property, the operation of the road begins. It begins upon a rate basis that requires the public to pay interest upon the bonds, which represent all the capital put into the business, dividends upon the stock which represent no dollar of investment; and enough more to create a surplus. The surplus is made the basis of a sinking fund ultimately to redeem the bonds, thus making the public pay for all the capital, and enough more to build the property over again and make it a real railroad, and to provide for permanent improvements. The surplus which the railroads of the country have created under the rates which they have been able to tax the people of this country have been sufficient to make the permanent improvements which they have made. The tunnel under the Hudson River was built out of surplus. The great Pennsylvania depot——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OLIVER. I can not allow that statement to be made without challenging it. The tunnel under the Hudson River, built by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., was built out of stock subscriptions issued at from 20 to 40 per cent above the par value; in other words, the par value of the stock being $50 a share, the Hudson River Tunnel was built by additional stock issued at a minimum of $60 a share.

I want to say also that from the very day the Pennsylvania Railroad was incorporated—I think it was in 1846—there never has been a single share of stock issued that did not represent at least $50, the par value thereof, in cash. I can not allow such misstatements to be made on the floor of the Senate without raising my voice in protest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am glad to have yielded, although not asked to do so by the Senator from Pennsylvania, to enable him to make his protest. It signifies nothing. Although the accuracy of his statement is in nowise admitted as correct, it signifies absolutely nothing. Every single improvement which has been made by the railroads of this country has been made out of exactions upon the public in unreasonable railroad rates,

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there has not been a railroad security issued in the State of Massachusetts for 25 years which has not been issued under the direction of the public-service commission and at a price fixed by the public-service commission, and that probably nine-tenths of the railroad stock issued in Massachusetts or under Massachusetts law during the past 25 years has been issued at a premium?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what does that signify in a State which has permitted the public to be exploited by the New Haven system, robbing everybody in sight? You may put upon the transaction——

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Wait just a moment; just one of you at a time.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just hold yourself in restraint for a few moments. You may put upon the face of these transactions the sanction of an appearance of compliance with decent business methods, but, Mr. President, it ill behooves the representatives from New England, who have been on this floor at all times the apologists and the defenders of the system that prevails in that section, which is exemplified by the operations of the New Haven Railroad Co.——

Mr. LIPPITT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not quite yet. Can you wait a moment?

Mr. LIPPITT. I can; but the Senator is continually making misstatements. He has already been corrected in two.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator wait until I yield before he takes the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will not take the floor at all if the Senator objects.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, the Senator can not take it, if I object, until I get through.

Mr. LIPPITT. I will not try to do so, if the Senator objects.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not object if the Senator will wait until I indicate that I have answered his colleague from New England.

Mr. President, I remember some years ago that I arraigned the railroad policy of New England, that I even ventured to criticize on this floor—and it was the first public criticism of that road made on the floor of the Senate—the operations of the New Haven Railroad, and I recall that the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Hampshire, who is not present now, I regret to say, came quickly to the defense of that institution, with the statement that there was not any suggestion of monopoly rates in that section and that nobody in New England was complaining. Why, at the very time that these gentlemen were on their feet making that statement, I had in my possession thousands of pages of testimony, taken in Boston, in a hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission of shippers all over that section complaining that their rates had been unjustly advanced; that they were being denied fair treatment by the railroads in the matter of furnishing cars; that they were suffering in every conceivable way from the injuries which monopoly can impose upon any community when monopoly is intrenched.

Mr. President, I am not surprised that I got a "rise" from New England. Her representatives on the floor of the Senate have been the defenders of a system in New England which permitted, sir, in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and in violation of the act of the Massachusetts Legislature, the New Haven Railroad to absorb the Boston & Maine Railroad, which was its chief rival and competitor in that territory and which permitted the New Haven Railroad to buy up every trolley line, every traction line, every electric line of any description operating throughout New England territory and between that territory and New York.

Mr. THOMAS. And every steamboat line.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Aye; and as suggested by the Senator from Colorado, they did not stop with that, but, when they had consolidated transportation under the one single control of the New Haven Road through all that territory by land, what did they do next? They went out, in violation of the Sherman antitrust law and bought up all the water transportation from Maine to New York. They swept the sea of any competition, gathered it into the control of the same organization——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not prepared to yield yet. I will yield when I get to a good resting place.

Mr. WEEKS. I am afraid I will forget some of the misstatements the Senator is making.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Take them down; but do not interrupt me to interject remarks into my speech improperly and in violation of the rules of the Senate. The Senator knows his rights.

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say to you, Mr. President, that there came no protest from the Senator from Massachusetts or from the Senator from Rhode Island or from any other Senator from New England while this iniquity was going on in that great section of this country, which subjected all the shippers of manufactured products to a monopoly that enabled the railroad to exact what rates they pleased. The testimony taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission is that they advanced the rates and reduced the service. Those two things always follow when monopoly controls. I care not whether it is monopoly in manufacture or monopoly in transportation, two things logically result: First, an advance in rates. Why? They have the power. Second, the deterioration, if it be a manufactured product, in the quality of the product. Why? Because they have a monopoly and can make the article as poor as they please, and the public, obliged to buy of them, must pay the price. If it be a public-service company, there follows an advance in rates and a deterioration in the service. That is what the shippers of New England complained of in the mass of testimony, a copy of which I have in my possession and have had for years, taken by Mr. Prouty, a member of that commission, and the other members of the commission, who conducted the inquiry in New England at that time.

Mr. President, that was not all that the people of that community suffered. Monopoly, in its greed to be a monopoly, in reaching for power to squeeze the public, does not hesitate at the price which it pays to achieve monopoly; and this New Haven organization paid grossly excessive prices for the various transportation properties which it absorbed, not under its own name always—oh, no; the absorption of the steamboat companies would be made under another name, and the absorption of the trolley, electric, and traction companies under another name. But you found, Mr. President, the evidence of the community of ownership of all these institutions in the interlocking directories; and when investigations came, the investigations conducted by the Interstate Commerce Commission down in Boston and elsewhere in New England, the investigations conducted by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who is giving me his attention—when all these investigations were made, Mr. President, it then became very apparent that—I will not say "extravagant," that does not fit the case—that reckless, criminal prices were paid for these properties. It made no difference, to those who were buying them, what they paid. One piece of railroad which the New Haven acquired, the name of which does not just at this moment come to me, of 15 miles, to complete its dominion over a certain territory, was paid for at the rate of $250,000 a mile, as I remember.

Mr. NORRIS. The Westchester.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Westchester, as the Senator from Nebraska suggests. What did they care if the public had to "pay the piper"? And when monopoly completes its dominion over any territory, its reign is absolute; the people are helpless.

Mr. President, the railroads of this great country have exactly the same history as the New Haven disclosed when it came to be investigated in court and investigated before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Frisco, the Rock Island, the Illinois Central—go where you will, throughout the land, if you had an investigation, and the cover had been ripped off, you would find the same scheme of public robbery. All this time we have had the Interstate Commerce Commission, to which the Senator from Nevada is so anxious to refer this question of wages, in order that we may get an equitable adjustment between the companies and the employees who are now some of them being compelled to sit in the cabs of their engines and hold on to the lever and the throttle, as shown by what I have read to you, a period sometimes of 65 hours, in violation of a law that is upon the statute books.

Now, if the Senator from Massachusetts would like to get in for a little while, I will yield. That will be quite satisfactory to me. Indeed, I think that is a better order of the day.

Mr. WEEKS. I think so myself.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I remember very well that the venerable Senator from Maine, Mr. Frye, said to me one time, in the closing days of his service upon this floor: "There can no longer be, in the Senate of the United States, important debates upon any question. Speeches prepared with care"—I am not now speaking of my performance, I beg the Senators to believe—"can not be delivered coherently. Instead of arguments we have conversations, and they do not rise much above the level and importance of conversations in the cloakrooms."

I believe that it would contribute much to the dignity and the importance and the value of debate upon this floor if Senators were permitted to make their arguments as they are required to make them in court, where a connected argument contributes to the consideration which the court is to give to the case, and counsel who are to close make their notes upon the statements and the arguments, and follow with arguments against those which have been made.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin has not forgotten that he was going to yield to me. I notice that he agreed to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, although I think I made a prior request.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield to the Senator from Rhode Island if he desires it.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to say——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LIPPITT. The Senator from Wisconsin is yielding to me. If it is agreeable to the Senator from Wisconsin——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I must yield to the Senator from Rhode Island first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I just wanted to make an observation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield to the Senator from Alabama for the observation as soon as the Senator from Rhode Island is through.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Rhode Island may consume the balance of the session. He may not give us an opportunity during this legislative day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it would be courteous for me to yield to the Senator from Rhode Island if he desires to make his observations now.

Mr. LIPPITT. I should like to yield to the Senator from Alabama, but I will not take more than two or three minutes.

When I interrupted the Senator from Wisconsin he had made two statements which had been contradicted upon the floor. Instead of replying to those he started to make another statement in regard to the New Haven Railroad, in which he referred to the robbery of that road. It only occurred to me to suggest, in answer to that statement, that the directors of that road have been tried for those offenses and acquitted by a jury. He followed up that statement by saying that I had supported New Haven monopoly rates on this floor. The Senator is entirely in error in that statement, and he can find no occasion when I supported monopoly railroad rates. So far as I know I have never discussed on this floor the rates that were charged by the New Haven Railroad.

He then followed up that statement by the assertion that the New Haven road, after having absorbed all the trolleys in New England, had proceeded to absorb all the water transportation in New England, and that it was done in violation of the Sherman law. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that practically all of the water transportation of the New Haven road had been owned by it for years before the Sherman law was passed. Much of it dates from an ownership of 50 years. So far from being against the wishes of the people of New England, and so far from its being the fact that he has in his possession statements of the people of New England desiring that the connection between the railroad and the water transportation should cease, I will say to the Senator that practically every important shipping interest in New England has petitioned the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep intact the relations between water and rail transportation in New England; and a resolution to that effect was passed by a unanimous vote of the Legislature of Rhode Island.

I have seldom heard in 10 minutes so many incorrect statements made upon this floor as I have listened to within the last 10 minutes. They have been contradicted not only by me but by two other Senators. The Senator from Wisconsin thinks he should be allowed to continue indefinitely to make statements of this sort. I have no doubt it would be very convenient for his argument to do that, but I think it does not tend to clarify the argument, or tend to any useful result.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is always the device of those who have the weaker side to inject into a discussion a denial, on the theory that one Senator's denial is as good as another Senator's statement. The Senator from Rhode Island has stated that the New Haven has always owned a majority of these water transportation lines. I put my statement against his, and I tell him that he has not stated the fact. I put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the acquirement of the lines, naming them, naming the time when they were acquired; and I say to the Senator from Rhode Island—and it is sufficient answer to anything else he says—that the original complaint filed against the New Haven Railroad for violating the Sherman antitrust law charged the acquiring of these water lines as a violation of that law.

Mr. LIPPITT (from his seat). They were mistaken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They were not mistaken; and Mellen came to the White House, after the complaint was drawn in which they were included, and persuaded Roosevelt, as President, to have them taken out of the complaint. He testified to that fact before the Interstate Commerce Commission in its most recent investigation of these affairs. The effect of taking that out of the complaint so weakened the complaint that when the administration changed and Taft came in, Wickersham gave it as his reason for dismissing the case against the New Haven.

Those are the facts. The New Haven did not own those lines. It bought them to get a monopoly; and the records of the courts and the records of the transactions disprove the statements of the Senator from Rhode Island.

I can not at this moment, after two or three years, without delaying the proceedings of the Senate, put my hand upon the RECORD in which the Senator from Rhode Island stood up here and denied that there was any monopoly control of rates, and defended the rates that the New Haven monopoly was then inflicting upon the people of New England; but it is to be found in the RECORD——

Mr. LIPPITT. Not from me.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From the Senator from Rhode Island, as is the defense made at the same time. I put my statement against that of the Senator.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LIPPITT. It is not within the function of any Senator to get up and say that statements I have made are false without at least giving me the opportunity to reply to him. The facts of the case are that what I was talking about was the ownership of the steamship lines by the New Haven Railroad, and not a discussion of railroad rates that were paid or a defense of them.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have not the RECORD at hand. My recollection of it is very distinct. I can only put my statement against that of the Senator. I know that I was charging at the time on the floor that the New Haven had a monopoly of transportation in the New England section, and the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Hampshire denied the statement and said that nobody in New England was complaining of transportation conditions, when, at the very time, there was sitting in Boston a section of the Interstate Commerce Commission—Commissioner Prouty—taking testimony; and more than 600 pages of testimony complaining about the monopoly rates and the bad service that this monopoly transportation company was furnishing were of record before that commissioner. Now, that is the fact about it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the Senator is perfectly correct when he says that I demonstrated to the Senate——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the Senator did not demonstrate anything. He simply denied the statement that I made, just as he is doing to-day.

Mr. LIPPITT. Well, then, I denied the statement that the Senator made, which was incorrect then and is now, that the New Haven had a monopoly of water transportation between New England and New York. I denied that then and I deny it now; but that is not a discussion of rates.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I can not prevent the Senator, so long as I extend to him the courtesy of the floor in my time, from continuing to make a misstatement as to what transpired at that time; but he does not give any strength to it by reiteration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield to the Senator now for just a moment. I wish to proceed as rapidly as possible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I merely rise to call the Senator's attention to what happened yesterday evening when we were considering the unfinished business of the Senate, commonly called the Post Office bill. The Senator came to me and said that he was compelled to leave the city at an early hour in the evening—about 5 o'clock or half past 4—and asked me if I would not consent to allow the matter to go over without a vote until to-day,

To oblige him, as I always am glad to do, I did consent, and the Senate adjourned at that time. Now, I did that in the confident belief, and certainly with the hope, that when the Senator came into the Senate to-day he would be willing that the Senate should proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business which was interrupted yesterday evening to oblige him.

The situation is that we lost two hours yesterday and to-day we have lost five hours. The bill has not been touched upon. There has been no consideration of it at all. What I want to do is to appeal to the Senator, as I appealed successfully this morning to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], to postpone the further discussion of this subject until some future time and let us proceed for a little while with the consideration of the business that is properly before the Senate. I feel confident that he will do that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When the Senator has concluded I will answer him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then the Senator may resume his seat, and I will answer him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I prefer to stand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator can scarcely expect to curtail the debate by making such a statement as he has made here. When the amendment was pending last night, when the Senator was sitting in the seat where the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] now sits, I approached and asked whether or not there was to be a vote upon that amendment before the adjournment. He stated there would not be a vote upon it. I told him I was very glad to know it, because I was called from the Chamber to go to a train, and I wanted to vote upon it, but that if there was to be no vote upon the amendment before the adjournment I would feel free to leave. I did leave, and the debate continued. The Senate did not adjourn upon that statement of mine, and the Senator does not state the fact. The Senate continued in session for 30 minutes after I left the Senate Chamber.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to make another——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not yield just now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. I will yield a little later if he desires.

I left the Senate Chamber. I made no contract with the Senator from Alabama that there should be a vote to-day or at any other time upon the amendment pending. I simply said that I wished to vote upon it, and if it was to be voted upon that night I wanted to know it. I left the Chamber 30 minutes before the session ended, and the debate continued 30 minutes, and when the Senate got ready it adjourned.

Mr. President, I have not been at all responsible for the time consumed this afternoon. A matter has been injected into the RECORD that in my opinion was entitled fairly to an offset and to a statement of the other side. I have heretofore taken no time of the Senate upon the Post Office appropriation bill, and I shall conclude as speedily as I can, and the end of the observations I have to submit will be reached very soon unless I am interrupted.

I should be glad to have the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who has dwelt at length upon the greatly increased expense and burden to the railroads of the higher wages that they have to pay their employees. I say to him that the records of this Bureau of Railway Economics, together with the statistics furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission, show that the labor cost per ton-mile unit of freight transportation is less to-day than it has been for a great many years. The reason for that is that one engine pulls three times the freight to-day that an engine did in 1907. [Reading:]

> The Bureau of Railway Economics, speaking for the railroads, announces that the net operating income of the railroads of the United States for November, 1915, as compared with the same months for five preceding years, increased 45 per cent.
> With the increased size of engines and length of trains and the improved devices for handling freight, labor costs the railroads less now—even though they pay more wages—than it did 20 years ago. The labor cost for an engineer per ton-mile unit was one and six-sevenths times greater in 1890 than in 1913.

Did you get that, Senators? The labor cost for an engineer per ton-mile unit was one and six-sevenths times greater in 1890 than in 1913.

Mr. President, I have additional material which I would be very glad to incorporate in the RECORD at this time, but I will reserve that material for another occasion should any effort be made later to refer the controversy between the employees and the railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I recognize the desire which the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads has to proceed with the consideration of this bill, and every Senator must feel an equal desire to further the passage of the appropriation bills as rapidly as possible. Recognizing that feeling, I do not care to take the time to discuss a question which has nothing really to do with the pending amendment to the committee amendment of the bill.

I have, innocently enough, I think, afforded the Senator from Wisconsin an opportunity to do what he delights in doing—that is, scolding somebody and using superlatives. When I injected an innocent statement about what the public service commission of Massachusetts had done for 25 years, a statement which he did not attempt to controvert and which no one could deny, he took occasion to attack Massachusetts, the New Haven Railroad, and other matters which relate to the territory which I in part represent.

I am not going at this time to answer or make any comments upon that particular attack. I think I will adopt the policy which he has just announced, and at some future time, and I hope not very far in the future, take occasion to point out some of the errors in the numerous statements which he has made this afternoon, which, to my mind, can be demonstrated as being wrong in principle and wrong in fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the pending amendment is the one offered by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I wish to present a few remarks concerning it.

I realize that for some years there has been a serious controversy between the Post Office Department and the railways of the country as to the method of compensation and the amount of compensation. This controversy has extended so long that it has given rise to serious doubt in the minds of Senators and Representatives in Congress as to what should be done, and it may be of interest very briefly to state the situation as I understand it.

Under the present law, the railroads are paid by the rule of weight, and this weight is determined once every four years. In August, 1912, Congress provided for the parcel post. Necessarily this has increased very largely the use of the railroads in distributing this class of mail matter. The Postmaster General in his last report estimated that about 1,000,000,000 parcels were distributed through the Post Office Department each year. If there were any irregularities and any injustice done to the railroad companies or to the Government before this parcel-post law was enacted, with this great increase in the uses of the railroads due to it those irregularities and this injustice must also have increased.

The question is, What plan shall be adopted? Shall the rule of weight continue? Or shall we adopt the rule of space, or a combination of the two? Students of the subject differ. I can understand how a very great injustice might be done under one rule of compensation if all the parcels mailed were ladies' bonnets. I can understand also how another great injustice might be committed if all the parcel-post packages consisted of metallic castings. Now, whether we shall have the one rule or the other, or a combination of the two, I, as one Senator, do not know, and I have not as yet heard an intelligent reason given in favor of the one at the expense of the other, or whether or not there should be a combination of the two.

I take it that this is one of the questions that ought to be determined by experts who have devoted a lifetime of study to the subject.

Now, what are the alternatives that are presented to us? The House in the measure which it has recently passed, and which is now in its amended form pending before the Senate provides the rule of space, but apparently the Members of the House were not contented with this rule, because they have conferred upon the Postmaster General the authority to increase the compensation which may be paid, if in his judgment for any reason that compensation may not be enough, and that increase is to be reported to Congress.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the House also provided for an appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. POMERENE. I was just proceeding to that very point. More than that, they cast discredit upon the plan they have adopted by saying we will not only give to the Postmaster General the authority to increase the compensation but we further discredit him by providing that this whole matter shall be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Then they are not content with that course. They would have the findings of the Interstate Commerce Commission reported back to Congress for their further investigation; with the study they have already given, covering a period of months, they have not come to a conclusion which is even satisfactory to themselves. Now, the matter comes to the Senate and it is referred to the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. After deliberating upon this subject, giving it every attention, and with a sincere desire, I have no doubt, to properly solve the problem so as to do exact justice between the Government and the railroads, they provide not a method of compensation but they say that the present method of weight shall continue until this matter shall be investigated by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then their conclusions shall not be controlling, but they shall come back here to Congress for the purpose of further investigation.

The course of this legislation has demonstrated, to my mind, very clearly that with all the information this committee has been able to gather they are not satisfied with the present law, and they are not able to determine what would be a fair compensation between the railroads and the Government.

Now, the Senator from Iowa presents his amendment, and in my judgment it more nearly meets the situation than any other proposal which has been presented to this Chamber or to the other House. What is it? In brief, it is that this subject shall be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission; that they shall call before them the Postmaster General and the representatives of the railroads and let each side present their case; and then the commission shall determine what shall be a just method and amount of pay as between the Post Office Department and the railroad companies.

I take it for granted that there is not a Member of this Chamber who wants the railroads to be either overpaid or underpaid. We ought to arrive at an exact figure which would give them a reasonable compensation for the service they are rendering to the Government, and that the Government and the people will cheerfully pay.

But, Mr. President, it has been suggested in my hearing several times that there is a very serious objection to this course, growing out of the fact that we are delegating a legislative power to a commission. I recognize the fact that we may go to extremes along that line, but we did not hesitate to delegate the power of legislation, if it is properly so called, to the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the rates as between the railroads and shippers and passengers. This tribunal was created by the Congress of the United States as a court to which passengers and shippers and the railroads could go to have their grievances redressed; and, humanly speaking, it is as capable as any other tribunal in the determination of questions of this character, because it was first built for that purpose, and it has been filled with and surrounded by men who are expert upon the subject.

We recognize the fact that in all freight matters there are classifications. They may depend in part upon weight, in part upon space, in part upon the value of the thing shipped. The determination of questions of this character is not new to them. They, in my judgment, can arrive at a right conclusion more nearly than we who are not expert upon the subject.

Is the Congress of the United States in a position where it can say to every shipper and to every railroad as between the two the charge for your shipment shall be controlled by the judgment of this tribunal and then in the next breath take the position that we have no confidence whatever in the judgment of this tribunal when it comes to a determination as to what the Government shall pay for services which may be rendered by the railroad companies for the Government?

Mr. President, the only difference, it seems, between the suggestion which is made by the Senate committee and the Senator from Iowa is this: The Senate committee would have the findings of that commission turned back to the Congress for the purpose of approving or disapproving them or of modifying them in whole or in part. The Senator from Iowa says that the findings of this commission ought to be conclusive for the time being. But he goes on further and says that if within six months thereafter or subsequently it shall appear either that the Post Office Department or the railroads themselves are dissatisfied with the rates which have been prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, then there can be a reinvestigation and a new finding.

It seems to me that if we have faith in this tribunal to fix rates for transportation both of passengers and freight we ought to be willing to abide by its judgment when it comes to that portion of the freight which is transported for the Government and which we call mail.

Mr. President, without meaning any reflection whatever upon any Member of the House or the Senate, I do not see how there can be any serious objection made to the suggestion embodied in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. We do not have the expert knowledge which will enable the Senate to decide this question. The committee in charge has not furnished it. The members admit they have not been able to get it. They suggest the reference of the subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which can get it. Let their conclusions be controlling, or at least until we get better light, and we can then change the rates to be paid. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will prevail.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will not be willing to accept a modification of his amendment on page 2, beginning in line 2, after the word "therewith," to read as follows:

And prescribe the method for the annual ascertainment of such rate or compensation?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask if the amendment would then read "and the service connected therewith and prescribe"—what?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It would read "and prescribe the method for the annual ascertainment of such rate or compensation." That is, when they are considering this matter and determining what is a fair and just rate, they may prescribe a method of ascertaining hereafter what it should be.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the understanding of the Senator from Alabama, would that have the effect to give to the department the power to change the rate from year to year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. This refers to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not to the department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator please read the amendment as proposed to be modified?

Mr. BANKHEAD. As proposed to be modified, the amendment would read as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine from time to time the fair and reasonable rates and compensation for the transportation of such mail matter and the service connected therewith and prescribe the method of the annual ascertainment of such rate or compensation and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the commission after due notice and hearing.

That is the modification of the amendment which I submitted to the Senator from Iowa a few days ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not quite able to comprehend just what the modification of my amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama would accomplish. I will read it for my own enlightenment.

And prescribe the method—

"Prescribe the method" for whom?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Prescribe it for themselves; determine for the railroads and for the department itself; it is a general prescription to determine the method for the annual ascertainment of such rate or compensation; that is, if under the provisions of the Senator's amendment the department or the railroads should conclude that the rates were not exactly fair and just there might be a rehearing, a reascertainment; and while they have made this rate and put it into effect, at the same time they can prescribe the method by which a rehearing or a refixing of rates may be determined.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Alabama will observe, the amendment itself provides that—

Either the Postmaster General or any carrier may at any time after the lapse of six months from the entry of the order assailed apply for a reexamination, and thereupon substantially similar proceedings shall be had.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is true.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it in the Senator's mind that the commission shall determine whether the compensation shall be based upon space or upon weight?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They may do either.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is that the thought in the Senator's mind?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; they may do either. When they are fixing the rate under the provision, they may fix it on weight or space or a combination of the two or in any other method.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I suggested to the Senator from Alabama that I saw no objection to his suggestion; but I did not then understand it just as he now proposes it. When the commission shall have fixed the rate or fixed the compensation, it must necesarily have prescribed a method. How could it fix the compensation without prescribing or adopting a method?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They have absolutely done that when they first fix the rate; but if there shall be an occasion for a change of those rates on an application of the department or of the railroads, it is believed that the matter might be very much simplified by some regulation of this sort.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, I think I can give the Senator from Iowa an instance in which this language would probably apply. If the commission should determine upon a system of weights, we will say, that would mean annual weighing; that is all. That is what it means as nearly as I can understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume, therefore, that it must mean that the commission is to prescribe a rule by which or through which the Postmaster General is to determine from time to time how much shall be paid. I am not sure about the scope of the language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the matter is so important as to lead to a controversy over it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not, however, prepared to accept the suggestion just at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is another suggestion, Mr. President, that I should like to make, which is on page 3, line 6, of the amendment, immediately after the word "received," to strike out the words "by each carrier," so that it will read "to be received at such stated times as may be named in the order."

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to that, Mr. President. In my opinion, it does not change the sense of the provision at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am willing that those words shall be stricken out of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa modifies his amendment to that effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, on page 4, I should like to suggest to the Senator this modification of the language of his amendment:

The existing law for the determination of mail pay shall continue in effect until the Interstate Commerce Commission under the provisions hereof fixes the fair, reasonable rate or compensation for such transportation and service and determines the method for the annual ascertainment of such rate or compensation.

That, however, is the same modification of the amendment to which the Senator objects, and I do not now insist upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I prefer to leave that matter in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for I can not conceive that the commission can fix the rate without prescribing the method of its procedure.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the commission should have some general rule and apply it everywhere.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure that the amendment gives the commission ample scope in that respect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, on page 3 of his amendment, beginning in line 21, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this provision:

In the case of any carrier which has received directly or indirectly through succession a public-land grant, the value of the grant or donation shall not be considered in determining the value of the railway property.

Under the law as it is and has been for a number of years, Mr. President, when it is ascertained what these land-grant railroads are entitled to receive for carrying the mail, a 20 per cent reduction is made. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa if, in his opinion, his provision here would be more satisfactory to the Post Office Department or to the Government than the present existing law, which is so well understood and which has been applied for so many years?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is impossible for me to see how a general law can be applied to a carrier and to a rate fixed for the carrier and subordinate the action of the commission to a contract. I have inserted that paragraph because, in my opinion, the value of property which has been contributed by the public through donations—a land grant or other such contribution—ought not to be considered in determining the value of the property which renders the public service.

I think it is the law now, but it is controverted by some very able students of the subject, and I want to put it beyond any controversy. Therefore I can not accept the suggestion that a certain named or prescribed deduction shall be made.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, under the existing law when the rates of railway mail pay are fixed for the railroads generally a 20 per cent deduction is made from the compensation paid the land-grant railroads; in other words, we give them 80 per cent of what we give a railroad which has had no land grant from the Government to aid in its construction. The language of the amendment of the Senator might give some trouble along this line. The amendment contains this provision:

In the case of any carrier which has received, directly or indirectly, through succession a public-land grant the value of the grant or donation shall not be considered in determining the value of the railway property.

Does the Senator mean by that the value of the grant for donation at the time the donation was made? It may be greatly enhanced, as the Senator knows, at the time when the valuation is made.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is another subject under dispute.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the language of the amendment of the Senator leaves it in dispute.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the valuation proceedings now going forward in the Interstate Commerce Commission the railway companies claim that their rights of way, which have been immensely enhanced in value by reason of the development of the country, although given to them or to their predecessors by the Government, shall be valued upon the basis of the cost of reproduction—that is, the cost of acquiring a similar right of way at the present time. Under this rule they hope to very greatly, and, as I think, very improperly, increase the value of the property upon which the public must pay a reward. So far as this matter is concerned, I want to put that dispute at rest, and say that it is our judgment, at least, that they are not entitled to that value in making up the aggregate value of their property.

With regard to the deduction of 20 per cent, however feasible that might be as a matter of contract, if the commission fixes a certain rate for the transportation of mail over a railroad which has received a donation or contribution from the Government, I do not believe it is within our constitutional power to say that, because it has received something from the Government, its pay shall be reduced 20 per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him right there, every one of these grants contained such conditions. It is a matter of contract between the Government and the railroads. They agreed to carry the mail, I think in most cases, at such rates as the Postmaster General might prescribe.

Mr. CUMMINS. Originally that is, but not from year to year.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but when the grants were made a condition of that sort was inserted as a matter of contract. I do not think there will be the slightest trouble of the character suggested by the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection to excepting any contract of that sort from the operation of this amendment, but I do not believe it could be imposed as a matter of law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not think there can be any doubt about the fact at all that the arrangement whereby 20 per cent is deducted from the gross payment to the land-grant railroads is a matter of contract, and my recollection is that it is included in the grant itself.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is in the franchise.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is in the franchise; and it is also true that the Union Pacific and some of the other land-grant railroads have a similar contract with reference to the transportation of troops.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not have that thought in mind, and I will be perfectly willing to accept an amendment which will provide that no railroad which enjoyed a land grant shall receive more than it has agreed to receive under the grant.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me just a moment, of course the manner in which he has used the word "value" in the amendment might leave open that whole controversy about whether value at the time the grant was made is meant or the present value of the property granted. Why is it not safer to follow the plan now followed by the existing law, which is based on contract in every case, and merely to make a 20 per cent deduction in the case of these railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. Simply because I do not believe it would be constitutional. I do not believe we have the power to pass a law of that kind.

Mr. HARDWICK. Congress has done it, and it has been sustained. I do not say that the Supreme Court of the United States has passed on it, for the railroads in question have not been in a position to controvert it, because in the franchises which they were granted as a condition of the grant they made an agreement which warranted and authorized that provision.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I said a moment ago, I am entirely willing to accept an amendment that shall retain the full benefit of the contract made under the land grants, and if the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Georgia will offer such an amendment, I will have no objection to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think we can perfect an amendment in the language of existing law providing generally in the case of land-grant railroads that a deduction shall be made of 20 per cent, as now authorized by law. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that will be satisfactory; but the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama does not contain that provision.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; it does not cover that.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to suggest an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. It seems to me that the question as to the basis of compensation should be embodied in the amendment proposed by the Senator. I do not think it is so embodied in terms, nor do I think it was quite embodied in the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee [Mr. BANKHEAD]. It is a proposition, of course, that has been considered by various commissions for the last 35 or 40 years. I refer to the space or the weight system, or a combination of the two. I will indicate where I think such an amendment ought to be made in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. Beginning in line 7, on page 1, I would have the paragraph read:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine from time to time—

Now, interline the following:

upon such basis as to space or weight, or a combination of the two, as to it may seem just—

Then, following, the language of the Senator's amendment—

the fair and reasonable rates and compensation for the transportation of such mail matter—

And so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, Mr. President, that raises the same question presented by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Alabama. I can not conceive how the Interstate Commerce Commission can fix the compensation or rate of compensation without adopting either the weight or space basis, or both, and possibly other factors as well.

Mr. STERLING. But let me say to the Senator that heretofore and up to the present time the compensation has been based on weight. The Interstate Commerce Commission might say, "We will consider no other factor than weight in determining the compensation." I should like to see the amendment in such terms as to call upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to consider other factors as a basis for the compensation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no objection to an amendment which will require the commission to consider the various bases and other factors as well. I do not want to confine the commission to the space theory or the weight theory, or to a combination of both, because there are other factors. For instance, much will depend upon the speed of the train, the character of the train, and the character of the car. All these things must be taken into account in determining the compensation.

Mr. HARDWICK. They can consider that. The Senator from South Dakota is right, I think, in suggesting to the Senator that it will improve his amendment to provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall adopt some system of determining rates, and then shall determine what rates are proper under the system they do adopt. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa the language of the committee amendment, because it is very carefully worked out on that point and meets all the objections he has just urged. Let me read it:

The commission shall also hold hearings and thoroughly investigate the so-called "space" plan and the so-called "weight" plan of railway mail pay, and any combination of the two, and any other plan that may seem to afford an accurate and fair basis for determining what compensation is just and reasonable, both to the Government and the railroads, for the carrying of the mails.

If that language were inserted, I do not think there could be any objection of that sort to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that language was intended to apply to a plan that involved a report to Congress on the part of the commission.

Mr. HARDWICK. It can be drafted, though, just as well in the form of an amendment to this.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to look over any amendment; but I think that needs to be rather carefully stated.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. As I understand, the Senator's amendment does not prescribe any plan upon which the mail shall be carried. It leaves that entirely with the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; it does not. It leaves it entirely with the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General is to file an application with the Interstate Commerce Commission setting forth the service which he desires, the character of the trains or cars or the speed of the train, the conditions of the service; that is to say, what supplemental service is required from the railway companies with regard to it. All these things are to be determined by the Postmaster General and embodied by him in a petition or application to the Interstate Commerce Commision. Then a hearing ensues, and the commission determines what the service which the Postmaster General requires of the railway companies is worth; that is, the fair compensation for that service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is not left discretionary with the commission to suggest a different service which might be less expensive?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; there is no such authority given in this amendment for the suggestion of a different service. I have assumed that the Post Office Department is the proper department to determine what service is required for the advantage of the people, and I leave it with the Interstate Commerce Commission to say what the Government shall pay for that service.

Mr. VARDAMAN. For the service prescribed by the Postmaster General? I think the commission ought to be permitted, if it is going to be charged with the investigation of this matter at all, to suggest as to the best plan or mode of carrying the mail.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. President, under the theory of the Senator from Iowa, the Postmaster General would be left to settle himself this very much mooted question as to whether we should have the space or the weight system.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all; because the space theory and the weight theory are simply factors or standards that are used to determine compensation. They do not relate at all to the character of the service. The Postmaster General desires a 60-foot car on a passenger train or a storage car on a passenger train. Now, whether it is to be paid for according to its weight or whether it is to be paid for according to the space occupied is entirely immaterial so far as the commission is concerned. The commission is simply authorized to say what the Government shall pay for that car moved a certain distance. It may say that it ought to be paid for according to the weight in the car; it may say that it ought to be paid for according to the space that is put at the service of the Government; but it is not a substantive matter. It is simply a part of a process used to ascertain what the compensation shall be.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield now, I think I have this thing drafted so that we can at least submit the idea. I agree entirely with the Senator from South Dakota about this matter. One of the great controversies is as to what system or plan you are going to adopt, and there can be no just determination of rights unless that preliminary question and more general question be first settled—according to my opinion, at least.

Now, let me suggest this—I have drafted it exactly as it appears—I suggest striking out the words in the Senator's amendment, after the word "determine," in line 8 of the first page, "from time to time" and inserting the following:

What system of fixing the rates for railway mail pay is just and reasonable, whether the so-called space plan or the so-called weight plan, or any combination of the two, or any other plan or system that may seem to afford an accurate and fair basis for determining what compensation is just and reasonable both to the Government and to the railroads for carrying the mail, and what are fair and reasonable rates and compensation—

Following the Senator's language. In other words, I would first, if we should put it exactly as I have drawn it there, require them to determine what is the system or plan that they are going to adopt, not confining them to any one plan, not even to one of the two that are most generally discussed, but let them determine which system they will apply, and what are just and reasonable rates under that system. Would the Senator be willing to do that?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will ask the Senator please to read it again, so that I may get the connection.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. I will start with the Senator's amendment and read just a word or two; then I will read it as it would be amended when I get through. I am reading from the Senator's amendment now:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed to fix and determine what system of fixing the rates for railway mail pay is just and reasonable, whether the so-called space plan or the so-called weight plan or any combination of the two or any other plan or system that may seem to afford an accurate and fair basis for determining what compensation is just and reasonable both to the Government and to the railroads for carrying the mail, and what are fair and reasonable rates and compensation thereunder—

I would insert the word "thereunder"— for the transportation—

And so forth.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me, I will try to elaborate that just a little.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The reason why I suggest that is this: It might be that the Post Office Department would submit to the Interstate Commerce Commission only one plan under the Senator's amendment, as it stands now. That is a matter of great consequence—whether the weight plan is right, or whether the space plan is right, or whether a combination of both might not be better, which is somewhat larger. By this amendment I would require the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass, first of all, on the preliminary and general question as to what plan or system they are to adopt; and then, having determined that general and preliminary question, I would go on, as the Senator does, and require them to determine what are just and reasonable rates under whatever plan or system they do adopt.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, to me the proposition seems illogical. The Postmaster General is not given the authority to determine anything about the space plan or the weight plan, or which plan he prefers. The Postmaster General is to say to the Interstate Commerce Commission what service he wants; and it is immaterial to him, under this view of it, whether the Interstate Commerce Commission requires that service to be paid for by space or by weight. I can not conceive how the Interstate Commerce Commission can fix or determine compensation without first determining the basis on which the compensation is to be adjusted.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me again, I quite agree with the Senator; and yet the thing that he can not believe there is any trouble about is where all the trouble comes. The railroads say that the plan of the Post Office Department is to force them to a space basis, so that they may load a given amount of space with an unlimited quantity of merchandise, or one limited only by the space, and divert a great deal of their light traffic from ordinary private carriage into the Government parcel post. They insist that under those circumstances nothing is fair and just except the weight basis. Now, I am not indorsing that contention, but I am showing the Senator how it is absolutely necessary to determine how much of that contention is sound and how much of it is unsound before you can go into the more specific question as to what rates are reasonable and just. They say that a space system will do them grave injustice and will ruin a great many of the smaller railroads of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am utterly unable to see just the bearing of the proposed amendment. This is referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission has up for consideration the inquiry: "How much shall the Government pay for a post-office car or a storage car per mile or per hundredweight in the car?" Now, the Interstate Commerce Commission must adopt a compensation for the service which is based upon some theory. If it adopts the space theory, it will say, "The Government must pay so much for every mile which the car passes over."

Mr. HARDWICK. For a certain amount of space.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it adopts the weight basis, it must say, "The Government shall pay so much per hundredweight in a car transported over a given distance." The Senator is asking that the commission be given the power, theoretically, to adopt one basis or the other.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I hate to bother him, but we get at the truth better in this way. There is one trouble about that. The reason why it is necessary to specify these things is that under the existing law, which will not be repealed by this amendment of the Senator's nor by the Post Office bill, weight is the only basis adopted. Therefore the commission, in the absence of some sort of legislation on the subject, might feel that they have no right to do anything except to adopt the weight basis; and we do not want them to feel that way.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the only consideration which appeals to me at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to leave them the full liberty to adopt whichever plan they think is best, and I am afraid they might not have it under existing law as the Senator's amendment stands.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am inclined to say that I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. We will try to put it in better shape overnight.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Georgia send the amendment to the desk?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator is willing, I will try to do it in the morning. We are not going to vote on it this evening. I will try to draft it a little more carefully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been so frequently modified that the Secretary has not the exact language of the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BRYAN. I offered an amendment, Mr. President. I think it would be the pending amendment now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no knowledge on that point save that the Senator from Florida offered an amendment and asked that it be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. BRYAN. I asked that the amendment be printed. I did not suppose that would prevent it from being read. The amendment is to the pending bill, but it is an amendment to the text of the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. But it is not in order to displace the other one.

Mr. BRYAN. It has to be voted on first, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it to the text of the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

Mr. HARDWICK. So is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, if the Chair please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it is to the text of the substitute.

The SECRETARY. It is to the part proposed to be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Florida has precedence, if it is to the House text.

The SECRETARY. On page 54 it is proposed to strike out lines 6 to 26, inclusive. The committee amendment does that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, are we not now taking up the bill for committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; we are considering committee amendments; but the pending committee amendment is an amendment which strikes out a portion of the text, and the rule surely is that where amendments are offered to the text——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is this amendment offered to that part of the text which it is proposed to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, very well.

The SECRETARY. On page 54 it is proposed to strike out all of lines 6 to 26, both inclusive, as the committee proposes to do, and in lieu thereof to insert:

The Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to hold hearings and to make a thorough investigation of the justness and reasonableness of the rates of railway mail pay fixed under this section, and if it finds that they are not just and reasonable for the service performed for the Government by the railroad mail carriers it shall make findings of what rates are just and reasonable and shall certify such findings to the Postmaster General, who shall adopt such rates, and, where greater or less than the rates fixed under this section, shall readjust the compensation of the carriers in accordance therewith. No change shall be made in the rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission except by the commission after investigation, which shall be made only upon application of the Postmaster General or the representatives of railroads with an aggregate mileage of at least 25 per cent of the mileage of the railroads carrying mails.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is that amendment? Where is it to come in the bill?

The SECRETARY. It is in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out on page 54, beginning with line 6 and ending on line 26.

Mr. HARDWICK. I raise a question of order on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, that, not being a committee amendment, being merely an amendment to the text of the House bill, it is not in order until the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The pending committee amendment does not commence until page 55.

Mr. BRYAN. This part of the bill is not a committee amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is the House text which the committee proposes to strike out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise to a question of order, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida is not in order until the pending amendment is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not in possession of a copy of the bill. Where does the amendment of the committee begin?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The part for which the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is a substitute is stated on the face of it. It begins at line 1, page 56, and goes to line 11, page 57.

Mr. BRYAN. I am relying on Rule XVIII of the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The amendment of the Senator from Florida is an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; it is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair gets this matter, the committee amendment starts in by striking out, commencing after the word "directed," in line 22, on page 42, all the House text down to and including the word "section," in line 5, on page 55, and in lieu thereof it proposes to insert, commencing at line 6, page 55, down to the end of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa, of course, is an amendment which is directed to the portion proposed to be inserted by the committee amendment, but the amendment of the Senator from Florida is to the original House text, and under the rule of the Senate it must be in order, because the Senate has a right to perfect the part proposed to be stricken out before it can vote upon the part proposed to be inserted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that question now disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair is disposed of, that the amendment of the Senator from Florida is in order and is now pending.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the Senator from Florida does not intend to press consideration of his amendment to-night, but simply wishes to have it printed and pending, to go over until to-morrow. In that case I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, June 23, 1916, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 22, 1916.

RECORDER OF DEEDS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

John F. Costello, of the District of Columbia, to be recorder of deeds for the District of Columbia.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Maj. Herbert M. Lord, Quartermaster Corps, to be lieutenant colonel from March 4, 1913, vice Lieut. Col. Beecher B. Ray, whose recess appointment expired by constitutional limitation March 3, 1913.

Maj. Robert S. Smith, Quartermaster Corps, to be lieutenant colonel from March 27, 1914, vice Lieut. Col. George F. Downey, promoted.

MEDICAL CORPS.

Capt. Nelson Gapen, Medical Corps, to be major from May 26, 1916, vice Maj. Deane C. Howard, promoted.

CAVALRY ARM.

First Lieut. Robert F. Tate, Eighth Cavalry, to be captain from June 3, 1916, vice Capt. Francis Le J. Parker, Twelfth Cavalry, detailed in the General Staff Corps.

First Lieut. Sebring C. Megill (Cavalry), Signal Corps, to be captain from June 3, 1916, vice Capt. Harry N. Cootes, Thirteenth Cavalry, detailed in the General Staff Corps.

Second Lieut. Robert S. Donaldson, Thirteenth Cavalry, to be first lieutenant from June 3, 1916, vice First Lieut. Robert F. Tate, Eighth Cavalry, promoted.

COAST ARTILLERY CORPS.

Capt. Edward Kimmel, Coast Artillery Corps, to be major from June 12, 1916, vice Maj. Alston Hamilton, detached from his proper command.

Capt. John R. Proctor, Coast Artillery Corps, to be major from June 12, 1916, vice Maj. Robert E. Wyllie, detached from his proper command.

First Lieut. Clifford L. Corbin, Coast Artillery Corps, to be captain from June 12, 1916, vice Capt. Edward Kimmel, promoted.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, our hearts instinctively turn to Thee for inspiration and guidance in the present crisis. We are brought face to face with the horrors of war and we most fervently pray that the differences which have brought us in contact with a neighboring nation may be wisely and peacefully adjusted without further bloodshed, that harmonious relations may be established to the good of all concerned. In the world's broad fields of endeavor there is room enough for brain and brawn without the clash of arms and the horrors that follow in its wake. Hear us, O Lord, and guide us by Thy holy influence, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in this and all lands, in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Consular and Diplomatic appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will read the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13383) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees Mr. FLOOD, Mr. CLINE, and Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 14303, the fortifications appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14303) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, when the bill was up for consideration before there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER], it being the only matter remaining to be considered in connection with the bill. I thought that perhaps some understanding might be had as to the debate that was desired on that amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think that everybody knows what the amendment is; we have had it discussed a number of times.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to unduly prolong the consideration of the bill, and at the same time I want to afford proper opportunity for the discussion of the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Those interested in the adoption of the amendment would like about 30 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Make it 30 minutes on a side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that there be 30 minutes' debate on a side on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and all amendments thereto, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TAVENNER, and the other half by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. TAVENNER, and one-half by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. I am a new Member and have not occupied the time of the House unduly since I have been here. There is a matter here that affects my district, and I ask as a favor that the House grant me the privilege of speaking for 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Upon what subject?

Mr. CALDWELL. On the appropriation for fortifications, or sites for fortifications. I understand that they are to purchase certain property at Rockaway Peninsula, which is in the district that I have the honor to represent. I have examined the title of the property, I have examined the property, and there are matters here that ought to be brought to the attention of the House. I ask the House to grant me time to tell the committee what I know about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the committee for 10 minutes, not to be taken out of the allotted time. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no desire to prevent the gentleman from making a statement touching the Rockaway matter, but I am not willing to open up the bill. When that item was reached I purposely put in the RECORD all the data I had touching the matter, and then was the opportunity for the gentleman or anyone else to discuss the subject fully. I am not willing to delay this important bill by opening up the matter again. I do not object to the gentleman speaking for 10 minutes if he so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation bill carries $1,400,000 for the purchase of sites for fortifications and the reclamation of land. It is the understanding, as I learn, between the committee and the War Department that the property to be purchased is one site on the Pacific coast and the other on the Rockaway Peninsula, which lies in the second congressional district of the State of New York, which I represent.

I have examined the title to the property in a cursory way; I have discussed the title with men who have searched titles in Queens County, N. Y., and I am authorized to say that William A. Ball, who has searched more titles in Queens County than any other man, says that the United States Government now has title to the property that would be purchased with this money. The facts are in 1808 the first record title upon this property appears. The title there was stated in a partition proceeding, and since that time there are records in the Queens County courthouse of title showing that the United States Government owned and maintained a blockhouse on the end of the peninsula where now stands the United States life-saving station, and that since that time the peninsula has grown to the extent of several miles by accretion. The railroad companies have a title from those who claim to own by adverse possession.

Adverse title has never been established against the United States Government, and in no case that has ever been tried in the courts has the United States been made a party. In my opinion the title, therefore, to this property that has been made by accretion belongs to the United States Government, and I think that any bill that carries an appropriation of more than a million dollars to buy property against which the United States Government certainly has claim of title should never be passed, unless there be a proviso that the money should not be paid for property to which we have the title or claim of title until the question has been litigated. Again, they propose to pay here in the neighborhood of four thousand and odd dollars per acre for this property. It is more than 3 miles from the nearest railway station. There is no road leading to it except one, almost impassable. You can not get to it in any kind of an automobile except some very high-powered machine or a very light one that has considerable power.

You can hardly go there on foot or by wagon and team or by boat that draws any considerable amount of water. The land itself is mostly about 18 inches above high-water mark, and every winter the storms sweep the water across the peninsula, and anything you build there would be swept away, unless built up with high embankments and proper sea walls; and in addition to that, across the bay, within half a mile, is Barren Island, where they destroy and render up the dead horses and animals that die in the State of New York, and it stinks, and stinks so badly that at times in the summer it is almost impossible for the people to live there. The highest valuation that I have ever been able to find anybody who was disinterested would put on this property was $2,000 an acre, and the consensus of opinion is $1,500 an acre, and I do not believe that because there has been an option delivered to the War Department of this Nation fixing the value at $4,000, which is fictitious, and in accordance with the schemes as set out in the letter sent here by Mr. Sharp and read to the House—I do not believe under those circumstances that we should permit any department of this Government to pay such an outrageous price for a piece of property at a time when the Government is under stress such as it is to-day. We have a condemnation law, and I propose that this condemnation law ought to be invoked in this case, in which event the title to this property and the value of it would be determined, and if we need it, and it does not belong to us, let us pay every cent it is worth and get it. I am in favor of preparedness and I am in favor of protecting New York City. It needs protection. It is the capital of the Nation in point of size; it is the center of wealth of the world to-day. It needs protection, but because of this condition there is no reason why we should let any set of real estate operators mulct the Treasury of the United States to the tune of a million dollars [applause], and I say to you that if this bill is not amended I am against it, first, last, and all the time, from top to bottom, and I propose to move to recommit the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is there any reason why the Department of Justice or the War Department should expend a dollar under the terms of the bill for any land they now own or a dollar more than the real value of the land which they acquire?

Mr. CALDWELL. There is no reason why they should do it; but the proposition is that I, for one, do not propose to set aside the responsibility which I owe to this Government and to the people who sent me here and deliver into the hands of any branch of this Government the right to spend this money that I have appropriated when I should not have appropriated it.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman thinks his judgment is better than that of the Attorney General?

Mr. CALDWELL. It is upon that question, and I will stand anywhere in the court or anywhere else and defend it.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there anything in this bill which obliges the Government to buy this land?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; but it permits it to be done, and I do not propose to have that done. The city of New York was mulcted in nearly the same amount of money for a similar piece of property on this peninsula. The same crowd of people in the sale of Dreamland Park mulcted the city of New York for about the same amount. The same crowd of people mulcted the city of New York on the marginal railway proposition, and they did it all with the same scheme and plan as they started out to do it here.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman mean to imply that there is a conspiracy to unload this property on the Government?

Mr. CALDWELL. I believe so, and I am here to fight it.

Mr. ANTHONY. What are the grounds for that statement?

Mr. CALDWELL. The grounds are these: The city of New York purchased a park over near this proposed site. In that park they offered the city an option, and that option was used for the basis of a valuation, and the valuation was fixed on the option and the city of New York paid more than twice the value of that property. They followed the same plan in the Dreamland proposition. That went into the courts, and they followed the same plan in the marginal railway proposition, and that is in the courts, and the courts have scored these people for their action in the Dreamland proposition. It was tried by another crowd of real estate operators in the East River Park, in the county which I have the honor to represent, and there the question was thrashed out, and instead of paying over a million dollars we succeeded in condemnation proceedings in getting an award of less than $700,000, and the matter is now being litigated, and if we start the same kind of condemnation proceedings here the United States Government will be protected as was the county of Queens in that last proceedings, and I want the protection.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Delaware. Where is the provision in the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. The provision in the bill will be found on page 3, lines 15 to 17, and I particularly call the attention of the House to the fact that in the hearings before this committee, on page 96, you will find these questions:

Mr. SHERLEY. This item is evidently for the purchase of land at Rockaway Beach?

Col. WINSLOW. One million five hundred thousand dollars is for the purchase of land at Rockaway Beach. Then there is another large item for the purchase of land for the new defenses at San Francisco.

Then, on page 107:

Mr. SHERLEY. And the department desires a sufficient sum appropriated to buy the site indicated at San Francisco and at Los Angeles, and at least the red area at Rockaway Beach—

Referring to a map submitted to the committee which is not set forth here for our information—

Col. WINSLOW. Yes.

And that is all the testimony that was before your committee that I have been able to find.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from New York, I would like to address the House for five minutes touching the matter to which he has referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The time not to come out of the time of one hour fixed?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes, the time not to be taken out of the one hour's time allowed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was up I particularly called attention to what was proposed in regard to the item for the purchase of sites. One of the most important things in connection with the fortifications of New York is the procurement of land at Rockaway Beach. That land is chosen not for any other reason than the military reason of being the one place where it is thought necessary to put this fortification. I had read from the Clerk's desk the letters of Mr. Sharp in order that the House might have full information—the gentleman from New York, who now seems to think that the House might have been misled into doing something it did not intend to do, not being then present or aiding in presenting information to the House—as I say, I caused to be read the letters of a real estate man there—a Mr. Sharp—criticizing those who claim to own this land and the value at which it was, as he thought, proposed to be sold to the Government. I stated then that I knew of no way by which the Government could properly protect itself in a matter of this sort if it could not rely upon the Department of Justice and the War Department and the right to condemn in the courts. I was not willing then, I am not willing now, upon the allegations made to refuse to make appropriations for the purchase of land that is of the utmost importance to this country; and it is important that that land should be acquired at as early a date as possible. I took occasion in my speech to call to the attention of the War Department and the Department of Justice the allegations that have been made touching this land that they might take the proper steps to protect the Government against paying a false price for the land, and in the event that we owned the land from paying any price.

I have personally brought it to the attention of the War Department and the Secretary of War. I do not believe there is any reason why the Government can not protect itself. I am willing to concede that there are a lot of rogues in the gentleman's district who desire to mulct the Government, and I took occasion to say that one of the things that is particularly depressing is, when it comes to a matter of the utmost importance to the Government, to find that the patriotism of its citizens frequently stop with their pocketbooks. But there is nothing in this that warrants the House, in my judgment, declining to make available funds to acquire land so imperatively needed. Then if this Government can not, through its proper machinery, protect itself from being robbed, we have indeed come to a deplorable situation.

But I am unwilling to believe that the Department of Justice is not able to pass upon the question of title as well as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]. I am unwilling to believe that the War Department or the officers of the Army are unable to prevent a false price being paid, and I must assume that in case of condemnation proceedings that at least 12 honest men can be found in the gentleman's district, or in that jurisdiction, to do justice to the Government of the United States.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say that is the only thing I ask, that this be taken by condemnation.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is nothing to prevent its being taken by condemnation, and every fact has been brought out and brought out openly. I took particular pains in the absence of the gentleman to bring all the facts to the attention of the committee and stated that I did so in order that there might not be any misunderstanding about the matter.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to say in connection with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes, not to be included in the time heretofore allowed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Endicott Board in 1886 provided for a mortar battery at Plum Island as part of the defenses of the city of New York. Nothing was done toward the erection of that battery. The changes in the topography of Rockaway Point, the improvements in high-power guns, developed the fact that Plum Island would not be the best place for the establishment of a very essential defense for the city of New York. For several years the War Department has been discussing plans to complete the defenses of the city of New York, and in the last Congress it was stated that the plans would be so far advanced that the completed scheme would be submitted to Congress at this session. It has been determined to erect certain high-power guns and mortars at Rockaway Point, and the department asked authority, or asked the money, to enable it to purchase the land deemed essential for that purpose. It was stated that an option had been obtained upon the certain land deemed necessary for those guns. After the committee had completed its investigation Mr. Sharp, a real estate man in the County of Queens, in New York, wrote me, I believe, four different letters, which contained statements of the facts referred to by my colleague from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]. I conferred with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who had charge of the bill, in reference to the matter, and it was determined that without any other information to enable the committee to determine exactly what the situation was that that information should be submitted to the Department of War, so that when the United States was ready to proceed to procure the property desired it would have this information to guide it in its conduct. During the consideration of the bill the gentleman from Kentucky placed in the RECORD a letter which was sent to the Attorney General by Mr. Sharp, inclosing the four letters which had been sent to me by him, and, in addition, made a comprehensive statement covering fully the entire matter.

So that the executive department of the Government has all the information available from the sources referred to as to the possible claims of the Government to the property itself and as to the advisability of paying the price at which it has been proposed to be offered. The city of New York has acquired through condemnation proceedings property in the vicinity for a public park, and the price fixed in the option is the price awarded to the owners of that property in the condemnation proceedings. I know the price awarded in the condemnation proceedings has been criticized severely as excessive and indefensible. My recollection is, although I am not certain, that the award has been sustained in the appellate court. There are a number of questions as to the title of the land under water. The city of New York has been claiming title to the land under water in Jamaica Bay. Within the past month the lower court in an action which had been pending for the purpose of determining whether title to the land under water belonged to the upland owners or to the city of New York has decided in favor of the upland owners. The committee had this information, that as an essential feature of the defenses of the city of New York certain guns must be erected at this particular locality.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The War Department, upon the information in its possession, believed that the maximum sum required to acquire the property, if it had to be paid for, was the sum provided in the bill. The War Department and the Department of Justice have been furnished with all of the information which has been received by the committee as to the probability that the Government has title and that the price at which the land has been offered is excessive. It is very rarely that Congress is able to determine what the value of a particular tract of land may be, particularly land located as this is, where there are not frequent sales to establish the market value. The committee has done——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the option carries a certain price, this option is submitted by the War Department to your committee, and the money is requested, and this House then appropriates that amount of money, will not the courts under the decision rendered in the city case of the said park be compelled to sustain that the full amount?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at all. In the city case and in the condemnation proceedings in the State of New York my recollection of the law is that the option is not admissible as to value. And we have not reported any specific sum to be paid for this property. Included in an amount appropriated for the acquisition of sites is a sum sufficient to meet what the War Department believes will be the outside price that must be paid for this land. Since that was done the War Department and the Department of Justice have had submitted to them the information that raises a question as to whether the Government itself does not actually own the land, as to the propriety of paying the price at which it has been offered. In the conduct of the business of the Government all that the legislative body can do is to provide the administrative officers with the means and the power to do what is essential for the public defense and then rely on the administrative officers to see that the Government is not improperly mulcted for money it should not pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask for another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be granted one minute more.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This land is claimed to be owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. or one of its subsidiary companies. I know the real estate man in Brooklyn who represents the owners of the land in the negotiations with the city. He is connected with the concern known as the Realty Associates. He had been connected with a concern known as the Neponsit Real Estate Co., from which the city of New York purchased the land for the park. The information which I received as to values and as to whether the title might be in the Government I immediately turned over to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and arranged that he should take the matter up with the Secretary of War. That is as far as we were able to go to see that the interests of the Government were protected.

Mr. HICKS. This property, as I understand, has been made by the ocean?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; it is made by accretions, and it adjoins property now in the possession of the Lighthouse Service, about which, if I am not mistaken, there was some litigation and an adjustment between the Government and the claimants to the property.

Mr. HICKS. May I ask my colleague if the Title Guarantee & Trust Co. has guaranteed the title on that property to the Southern Pacific Railway Co.?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know, but I do not believe it would be important, because adverse possession can never be sustained against the Federal Government; and if there be no record title and the Federal Government establishes its right, the guaranty of a title company would not defeat the Government claim.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he has charge of the time?

Mr. SHERLEY. There has been one hour of time granted, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] and 30 minutes by the gentleman from Ilinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I read the statement of the——

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be first read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAVENNER: Page 14, line 18, after the word "rate," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

"Provided, That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States while making or causing to be made with a stop watch, or other measuring device, a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

[Mr. TAVENNER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to stop the pay of the superintendent or overseer where a stop watch is used, and, secondly, it prevents the payment of a bonus or excess pay to any workman who happens to be more efficient than other workmen; in other words, it reduces the workmen to a common level and prevents anyone from rising above that level in compensation. To that extent it is subject to criticism, and I hope before we get through that some one in favor of the amendment will tell us why a workman who is thoroughly efficient, more so than other workmen with whom he competes, should not receive extra compensation for that efficiency.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not yield, I have not the time.

Mr. KEATING. I will get the gentleman two minutes more if he will answer the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. I want to say to the gentleman that there is nothing in the amendment which will prevent the recognition of superior efficiency in workmen. There is nothing in the amendment which will prevent one workman from receiving one rate of pay and another workman from receiving another rate of pay. The only thing is to prevent two forms of compensation—the bonus and the premium system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman's attention to the second section of the amendment:

Nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premium or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

In other words, if he is rated at $3 a day and is worth $4, he can not receive any more than the $3.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say that gentlemen can answer the suggestion, and I hope they will—why a man, who is efficient, faithful, and dutiful in a public establishment, can not receive extra compensation for extra efficiency or for work above the average.

That all workmen are not agreed upon this question I pointed out a year or so ago. The gentleman from Illinois referred to the fact that some one might produce a petition of 400 men from some arsenal, which I presume referred to the publication by me in the RECORD of a petition of 400 or 500 men from the Frankford Arsenal. In view of the fact that the gentleman has called up this matter, probably in anticipation, I will send it to the Clerk's desk to be read. It shows that all workmen, organized and unorganized, are not of one mind on the question whether or not their pay shall be at a fixed sum, and that no matter how hard they work or how efficient they are, they shall receive no more. I ask that the communication be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., January 28, 1915.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The committee named below, representing 400 employees of the Frankford Arsenal, earnestly protest against the legislation in the Army bill depriving us of our premium rate of compensation, which was established at this arsenal over five years ago to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned. The enactment of this legislation means an annual loss to us of about $44,972. You are requested to use your utmost endeavors to have this legislation struck out by the upper House of Congress or so modified that we will not be deprived of our increased earnings under the premium system.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH B. MOSS,
HARRY G. PENN,
JOHN JESBERGER,
Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, Mr. Chairman, with all respect to the gentleman advancing this amendment, if that statement is true, the workmen who are honestly striving to serve the Government are deprived of $44,000 of earnings that they would have received if this amendment had not gone into the Army bill. In other words, instead of representing the workmen, this amendment takes the money away and prevents them exercising the functions that God has given them to serve the Government.

Now, since that time I have received two petitions which bear upon this matter in another way. They pertain to certain provisions in another appropriation bill, but the arguments set out in behalf of the workmen apply here. I send the first petition to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 5, 1916.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The undersigned petitioners employed at Frankford Arsenal again take the liberty of inviting your attention to the following provision of law contained in the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government:

"SEC. 4. That section 7 of the general deficiency appropriation act approved August 26, 1912, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That no part of any money contained herein or hereafter appropriated in lump sum shall be available for the payment of personal services at a rate of compensation in excess of that paid for the same or similar services during the preceding fiscal year; nor shall any person employed at a specific salary be hereafter transferred and hereafter paid from a lump-sum appropriation a rate of compensation greater than such specific salary, and the heads of the departments shall cause this provision to be enforced: Provided, That this section shall not apply to mechanics, artisans, their helpers and assistants, laborers, or any other employees, whose duties are of a similar character and required in carrying on the various manufacturing or constucting operations of the Government."

You will see from this legislation that clerks, minor clerks, skilled office laborers, draftsmen, assistant draftsmen, and the chemists employed at this arsenal can not receive any increase in compensation which is in excess of that paid for the same or similar services during the preceding year. It does not make any difference if a clerk or draftsman increases in efficiency and makes himself more valuable to the Government, he can not be paid any more this year than he was paid last year if his services are the same or similar. This legislation does not take into consideration even the increased cost of living for which additional compensation is usually allowed by employers. If a clerk or draftsman should be employed at a trial salary and with a promise that if he made good he would receive additional compensation the following year, such a promise could not be legally carried out, and yet such a method of hiring men is not unusual in all walks of life.

You will further observe that this section does not apply to mechanics, artisans, their helpers and assistants, laborers, or any other employees, whose duties are of a similar character, required in carrying on the various manufacturing or constructing operations of the Government. We believe that the clerks are just as necessary to manufacturing operations as any helper or assistant in any shop. Why should there be a difference between the men who sweep the floor, oil the shafting, run the elevators, etc., and the skilled office laborers who attend to the time cards, job cards, and various requisitions for material needed in the shops? The condition of employment for these clerks in the shops is just the same as for the other workmen who are exempted in the proviso from the operation of the law. Furthermore, the mechanical work in the shop is largely done by mechanics, but from drawings prepared by draftsmen. Without these drawings the mechanic could not work with the dispatch and accuracy required at a Government establishment. The leading draftsmen visit the shops and are just as much a part and parcel of this manufacturing plant as are the men who actually operate the machines.

A professional man, like the chemist, may make a valuable discovery for the Government, but there will be no reward for him unless the pay for the same or similar service was higher in the preceding fiscal year.

The provision exempting mechanics, artisans, laborers, etc., must have had in view that these men will have their rate of compensation increased by reason of increased efficiency, by reason of higher rate of pay paid for similar services by outside establishments, or by an increase in the cost of living. If all these three results are good reasons for increasing the pay of the exempted employees, they are just as good reasons for increasing the pay of clerks, draftsmen, etc., who are not exempted by the proviso referred to. The clerks at this arsenal are not high-priced employees; a large proportion receive as low as $540, $600, and $660 per annum, which is only the pay of the skilled laboring class. Surely Congress does not desire to prevent these low-priced clerks from receiving increased compensation if they have increased their efficiency or if it costs more to support them. A few men drawing $600 per annum have families, and Congress can not expect a man to raise a family if he has no better outlook than $600 per annum for his services. A number of the draftsmen receive $900 to $1,000 per annum, which is only the pay of machinists and toolmakers, who are in the exempted class. The highest rate of pay paid draftsmen at this arsenal is $2,200 per annum and to clerks $1,800 per annum, but these men are not only draftsmen and clerks, but executives having broad responsibility.

It should also be noted that this legislation does not work for the benefit of the Government, in that is makes it difficult to retain efficient employees. The work performed by the clerks and draftsmen is of such a nature that it takes some time for them to become familiar with their duties and with the Government method of transacting business. When a clerk or draftsman realizes the legal obstacles in the way of his obtaining an increase in compensation, he seeks employment elsewhere, and particularly in the case of the better grade of employees, who are generally graduates of a commercial or technical institution, such employment is not hard to obtain. These employees have acquired a knowledge of Government methods at the expense of the Government, and when they resign the valuable experience acquired by them is lost to the Government. This does not apply in the case of mechanics, artisans, laborers, etc., who in general have to devote little or no time to acquiring a knowledge of Government methods and are, as a rule, as efficient on the first day of their employment as at any time thereafter, and vacancies in these exempted classes therefore mean little or no loss to the Government. It would seem, therefore, that the advantage of modifying the present legislation so as to remove the restriction on increased compensation for clerical and technical positions is apparent.

Employees, whether mechanics, artisans, clerks, draftsmen, or others, in so far as their value to their employer is concerned, are rated by the same method, and the reasons for increasing an employee's compensation are the same for a mechanic as for a clerk. It therefore appears to the undersigned that the provision above mentioned, creating different standards for consideration in the treatment of Government employees and resulting in unfair discrimination against certain classes of employees, is one that Congress would correct when brought specially to its attention.

The conditions as outlined above were brought to your attention several months ago, and a petition was also addressed to the Secretary of War, in which his attention was invited to the discriminatory legislation referred to above and requesting him to bring this situation to the attention of the Congress with recommendation that proper legislation be enacted which would enable clerks, draftsmen, and other office men at the manufacturing arsenals and navy yards to be paid a higher rate of compensation than that paid during the preceding fiscal year when their efficiency demands it, when there is a corresponding increase in the rate of pay paid for similar services by outside establishments, or when an increase in the cost of living justifies it. It was also suggested to the Secretary of War that if the provision referred to in paragraph 1 of this letter were worded as follows, it would accomplish the purpose desired by the undersigned:

"Provided, That this section shall not apply to mechanics, artisans, storehouse keepers, their helpers and assistants, laborers, or any other employees, including clerks, draftsmen, and technical employees, whose duties are of a similar character and are required in carrying on the various manufacturing and constructing operations of the Government."

A letter was received from the Secretary of War under date of July 13, 1915, in which he acknowledged receipt of this petition, and stated that he would submit to the next Congress a draft of legislation designed to place all employees of the War Department on an equal footing in regard to their right to increased compensation for increased efficiency in the same class of work.

Respectfully, ——— ———.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print the remainder of the letter in the RECORD. The letter continues to say that there is a discrimination against a certain class of workmen. This is all pointed out in the letter. I am sorry it can not be read on account of time, because I think it would be informative to the House. It indicates that there are a number of workmen who want to do faithful service and who object to being held down to a common wage level.

But here is another communication received March 4, 1916, and also numerously signed by the workmen, that I hope there will be time to have read in full. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE FRANKFORD ARSENAL ASSOCIATION,
Philadelphia, Pa., March 1½, 1916.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your attention is invited to the provision of law contained in the act of Congress approved March 4, 1913, providing for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. In a few words, this law provides that draftsmen, clerks, and other salaried Government employees can not be paid any more in one fiscal year than in the preceding one for the same or similar services.

It will be readily understood that this provision of law offers no encouragement whatsoever for a draftsman or other salaried employee of this or any other arsenal to increase his efficiency or make a special effort to develop increased value on his part to the service.

Under the abnormal conditions which obtain at the present time in private establishments manufacturing munitions and other war material a demand has been created for experienced men, and the various arsenals and other Government institutions have been looked to for such help. While the average Government employee realizes that positions with such establishments are possibly of a temporary nature they accept them because they have no assurance that their increasing worth to the Government will benefit them by reason of the above-mentioned restriction placed on the increase in compensation.

We would appreciate it very much if you would bring the justice of our cause before the chairman and other members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations who will have charge of the legislative, executive, and judicial bill on its receipt from the House of Representatives with the request that a proper clause be inserted which will relieve the clerks, draftsmen, and other salaried Government employees from the discrimination which at the present time exists against them by reason of the act of Congress dated March 4, 1913.

Yours, very respectfully,

F. A. STEGMAN,
President.
JOHN J. L. MERGET,
Secretary and Treasurer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in conclusion that because of this efficiency business at the arsenal from which these petitions come, many of the best men have gone into private establishments at higher wages than the Government pays. The Government has been losing the services of these capable men while private establishments have been getting the benefit of them.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] contends that there is no way under the provisions of this amendment to increase the pay of employees. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in all Government establishments they have a system of grading mechanics and all employees, and the Government itself and its officers can pay to each and every individual of their mechanical force any pay that they see fit under the rating system, consequently there is no force to the gentleman's argument that there is no opportunity for the ambitious employee. They can pay them $4 a day or $10 a day, and they get paid for efficient service; and I want to call attention to this fact, and it is testified to by Gen. Crozier before the Committee on Labor. Under the day-labor system they permitted only 10 men, first-class machinists, in the Watertown Arsenal to reach the first class out of several hundred mechanics, and the 10 men were only receiving $3.52 per diem; but under the Taylor system they claimed to permit the lowest-paid mechanics to reach the same standard of efficiency and the same rate of pay as the higher-skilled mechanics; but under the old day system there was no incentive for a mechanic to increase his efficiency and output, while under the Taylor system, the driving system, the system that breaks down the man, they will agree to pay him a bonus and premium but they take two-thirds of it away from him. I want to say to the gentleman that the manner in which the petition from the Frankford Arsenal was obtained will be touched upon by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], but in case the gentleman does not have the time to go into the matter, I will incorporate Gen. Crozier's testimony in the RECORD at this point:

Mr. NOLAN. Did you understand at the time this measure was pending before the House in the last session that you would be compelled to stop the payment of premiums and bonuses; that is to say, where you had set a task, that you would be compelled to stop the bonus or premium system, and that this bill would be retroactive?

Gen. CROZIER. I did not think that. I did not think the order was retroactive. I forbade the payment of premiums, except such as had accrued at the time of the receipt of the order.

Mr. NOLAN. In other words, you prohibited any further effort on the part of the officials of the Frankford Arsenal to pay a bonus or a premium from that day on?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NOLAN. Why did you issue that order at a time when this proposition had not become law?

Gen. CROZIER. Because I wished the employees to understand what they were threatened with. I wanted to get before them, by practical experience, what was going to be their lot if this legislation were passed.

Mr. NOLAN. Didn't they have that experience before you introduced that system?

Gen. CROZIER. They had had it a long time before.

Mr. NOLAN. How long before?

Gen. CROZIER. I introduced the premium system at Watertown Arsenal in 1911. I introduced the Taylor efficiency system in 1909. It went on for two years before we started the premium system.

Mr. NOLAN. As I understand it, this petition came from the Frankford Arsenal. How long had the bonus and premium system been enjoyed over there?

Gen. CROZIER. I can not say, for the reason that the Frankford Arsenal, like the Springfield Arsenal and the Rock Island Arsenal, is an establishment where that kind of payment had been going on for many years. I had not employed at that time in those places any systematizer or expert in shop management, with reference to the introduction of such a system. As Watertown Arsenal was one where there had been no piecework, I did employ a systematizer, so that date is more distinctly in my mind. The Watertown Arsenal does not lend itself to piecework payment.

Mr. NOLAN. Do you think it is proper, Gen. Crozier, for a man holding your high position in the Government service to issue an order of that kind for the purpose of working up the employees, if I may use that term?

Gen. CROZIER. I think it is not only proper, but I think it is my duty to inform the employees who are concerned of anything of that kind which it is pending, and how it is likely to affect them.

Mr. NOLAN. Is there not a distinct difference between informing them of the effect of the legislation and putting into effect through an order the force of such legislation before you knew that Congrss was going to adopt it?

Gen. CROZIER. There is a difference, of course. By putting that order into effect I showed what would happen if Congress adopted this legislation, further than to merely inform these people. You must certainly know that to inform people of something which is impending in the future and may arise is not nearly so effective a way of making them thoroughly aware of what is involved as to put it into effect at once.

Mr. NOLAN. Following this out to its logical conclusion or its last analysis, suppose any officer of the Army should put into effect an order that affected the enlisted men while legislation was pending in Congress that would prohibit a certain system being abolished—a system that had been installed by Army officers—what effect would that have on the discipline of the men in the Army and on the entire establishment?

Gen. CROZIER. It might have a good effect. I would not be certain that it would have a good effect unless I knew the case.

Mr. NOLAN. Is it good policy?

Gen. CROZIER. In this particular instance I think it was good policy, although it did not accomplish what I hoped it would. This legislation was conceived, or was said to be conceived, in the interest of the employees. I wished to let them see whether it was in their interest or not, and a great many of them thought it was not.

Mr. NOLAN. You purposely put it into effect for the purpose of creating opposition to the amendment?

Gen. CROZIER. I put it into effect for the purpose of letting them see how it would affect them.

Mr. NOLAN. And for the purpose of causing opposition to it?

Gen. CROZIER. I thought it would have that effect in some degree.

Mr. NOLAN. You thought so?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NOLAN. At the Watertown Arsenal?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir; to a certain extent.

Mr. NOLAN. As a general proposition did it have the same effect at Watertown Arsenal, where the entire time system had been applied, and not part of it? You said, as I understood it, that the stop-watch system had not been introduced at Frankford, but at Watertown?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NOLAN. That, as I understand it, is the most objectionable feature of this system. Did it have the same effect at the Watertown Arsenal as it did over there?

Gen. CROZIER. No, sir; it was not so extensive.

Mr. NOLAN. I am going to ask now in regard to Watertown. Do the officials of the Watertown Arsenal give the employee consideration by consulting with him regarding the amount of bonus or premium to be paid?

Gen. CROZIER. No; they do not. The rule under which a bonus or premium is paid is well understood, and all employees who apply at the Watertown Arsenal for work are informed that that system is in operation there when they apply, so that they come to work under the system with a full knowledge that it is in operation.

Mr. NOLAN. Then the system itself determines the bonus or premium to be allowed to the employee and the employee has no voice in the matter at all?

Gen. CROZIER. He has just the same kind of voice as he has in his wages. The employee is only asked with regard to his wages when he comes there, if he is willing to go to work for a certain sum. That is the only question he is asked.

Mr. NOLAN. He knows when he goes to work what his day rate will be and what rating he will have?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir; he knows when he goes to work.

Mr. NOLAN. And he generally knows pretty well all the ratings in the arsenal when he goes there?

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. NOLAN. After he goes there you place him under this system in all its phases. Do you then give him any voice in the matter of determining the amount of bonus or premium he may receive over and above his day rate?

Gen. CROZIER. That is to say, do we tell him, when we give him a job of work, and give him the time in which it can be done, or the time in which he is expected to do it, that he will be given so much more if——

Mr. NOLAN (interposing). Do you consult with him as to what is a reasonable bonus or premium and as to whether or not it is satisfatory to him?

Gen. CROZIER. No, sir. He is privileged, if he chooses to do so, to say that the time is too short, and that he can not earn that premium in the given time. They oftentimes do say that.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KEATING. Let us refer now to this Frankford Arsenal order. You issued an order before the rider on the military bill reached the Senate. What was the nature of that order? I did not catch it when you made your statement.

Gen. CROZIER. I directed the suspension of the payment of all premiums except such as had accrued at the time of the receipt of the order.

Mr. KEATING. Did you notify the workmen that the premium system would be abolished in case the rider carried?

Gen. CROZIER. I intended that to be the effect, except that I realized the rider was attached only to the Army bill. I fully expected that the same rider would be attached to the fortifications bill, and I have never been able to understand why it was not.

Mr. KEATING. How much of a reduction did that cause in the salaries of the employees affected?

Gen. CROZIER. The best estimate can be formed by looking at the table which I have handed to the stenographer. Applying it to the month of January, my recollection now is that the premiums paid in January, 1916, were $3,300. That kind of an order applied to the force existing this last January would have reduced the pay of the establishment $3,300.

Mr. KEATING. When did you revoke that order?

Gen. CROZIER. As soon as the issue was determined by the passage of the bill with that legislation attached.

Mr. KEATING. You went back to what system?

Gen. CROZIER. I stopped the premium payments at the Frankford Arsenal. I went back at the Watertown Arsenal to the system which had prevailed before I issued the order.

Mr. KEATING. What about the Frankford Arsenal?

Gen. CROZIER. There I changed from the premium system to the piecework system.

Mr. KEATING. What was the result on the salaries of the employees?

Gen. CROZIER. I do not think there was very much effect after that, as compared with what their salaries had been before I issued the order, because by an easy arrangement a piecework system of payment was devised which gave the same pay as the premium system had given.

Mr. KEATING. You succeeded in that way in evading the will of Congress?

Gen. CROZIER. I succeeded in avoiding the application of the reduction. I can not say it was the will of Congress, because one of the prominent advocates of your legislation—when I say "your" I do not mean you personally—said it was not intended to apply to the piece-work system.

Mr. KEATING. Would you share his view in case we passed this bill?

Gen. CROZIER. That may have been what he thought was the intention. It is a difficult matter to find out just what is intended by legislation sometimes.

Mr. KEATING. You knew this gentleman's ability as a lawyer?

Gen. CROZIER. I did not rest on that. I appealed to the comptroller.

Mr. KEATING. You would not accept the comptroller's opinion, after the penalty was attached?

Gen. CROZIER. I would not.

Mr. KEATING. It would be comparatively easy to determine what the will of Congress was, and execute it, would it not?

Gen. CROZIER. It would be then up to me to avoid the risk of directing an officer to perform an act which might be a criminal offense.

Mr. KEATING. Didn't you understand that when Congress added that rider it wished the premium and bonus systems to be abolished in Government work?

Gen. CROZIER. I had no way of knowing the will of Congress except by its legislation. I can perhaps throw a little light on the latter by saying: The Member of Congress who proposed that amendment, and at whose instance it was added to the law, was aware, before it was too late to attach that same kind of a rider to the fortifications bill, that without attaching it the legislation would not apply to funds under the fortifications bill, and he did not seek to do that.

Mr. KEATING. You did not seem to experience any particular difficulty in interpreting the law when you issued the order suspending the bonus system at Frankford Arsenal.

Gen. CROZIER. The law applies to Frankford. Do you mean Watertown Arsenal?

Mr. KEATING. You issued an order at Frankford which you say you intended as a warning to the employees as to what would occur in case it went into effect.

Gen. CROZIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEATING. Then, after the rider was put into effect, you came forward with a scheme by which you evaded the plain intent of Congress, but you did not tell the workmen you had that in mind when you issued the first order.

Gen. CROZIER. You say I evaded the plain intent of Congress. I did not evade it in the opinion of the comptroller.

Mr. KEATING. How about Frankford Arsenal? Was that order issued under a misapprehension of what this legislation meant or intended?

To be perfectly frank, you attempted to show these employees what you thought the effect of this legislation would be if it passed, and after the rider was adopted, you found means by which you could avoid the purpose of the legislation?

Gen. CROZIER. I found means by which I saved them from the disadvantages of the legislation.

Mr. KEATING. You did not suggest there was a way out of it when you issued the warning?

Gen. CROZIER. I did not.

Mr. KEATING. You referred to this legislation that was pending and you warned them if the legislation was passed a certain situation would be created, and you did that for the purpose of getting them to protest to Senators and Representatives?

Gen. CROZIER. I did that for the purpose of allowing them to protest if they wanted to.

Mr. KEATING. You are warning them that in case certain legislation was enacted a certain condition would be created, and instead of that you created an entirely different situation?

Gen. CROZIER. I found a way of saving them from it.

Mr. KEATING. You think it is perfectly proper, do you, for the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army to conduct himself in that fashion?

Gen. CROZIER. I do.

Mr. KEATING. While legislation is pending in Congress?

Gen. CROZIER. I do.

Mr. NOLAN. I have a petition here from 190 of the unskilled workers of the Watertown Arsenal, protesting against the Taylor system and wanting it abolished; and I want to read a letter that I have received from the Secretary in submitting it:

PETITION APPENDIX.

To Our Worthy Congressman and House of Representatives:

The 190 unskilled and underpaid workers in this arsenal submit this "Appendix" to our petition of June 8, 1916.

By our phrase "the entire Taylor premium system" we mean the whole of the infernal imp, as constituted to crush humanity to the lowest depths of animal existence.

Since we are intelligent beings, and not cattle or even a part of the machine we operate, we have a right to be heard.

The flower of American youth was sacrificed for freedom from tyranny and slavery, yet are not our conditions worse to-day?

The Israelites in Egypt at the time of Moses complained of taskmasters and abuse; can we boast of better things?

The Egyptians may teach as they live, but we believe in the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man to man, and are sure His greatness can deliver us from this bondage.

Can a person be worse than having to work hard and starve at the same time? This is our attitude. For example, one of this committee of three has a family of five and another member has a family of seven to support on a wage of $12 each per week. Is it not time the Government should hear the cries of their suffering servants trying to raise a family for the good of their country on food that costs less than 4 cents a meal for each person, faring worse than criminals in our prisons?

Is it not time we look to our worthy Congressmen for relief from this dreadful environment?

We do not receive $1 a week more than the Government paid many years ago, when $1 in its purchasing capacity was equal to $3 to-day, according to the methods of living.

When this committee was called upon by our commanding officer to receive his reply to our requests for higher wages, we were told that we are paid as much as is paid in this vicinity for similar work. Yet we are under the impression that the civil-service examination should place us above the average consideration. The towns, cities, and contractors are paying to common laborers from $15 to $18 per week for 44 hours.

We called our commanding officer's attention to the fact that the Government should take the lead in being an ideal employer, and set an example of paying living wages to its employees, which was ignored. Therefore we appeal to Congress for the worthy consideration that the Nolan bill be made a law the earliest moment during this session of Congress.

It is not preparedness parades but a proper system of life and contentment that creates real patriotism.

If we should be compelled by our Government to continue to starve while we work, we must necessarily speak to the Nation for relief.

We are your servants in hope of justice.

JOHN GREENE,
NICHOLUS J. YOUNG,
FRED S. FRYE, Secretary,
Committee.

APPENDIX COMMENTARY.

If our worthy Representatives need more light on our "Appendix," our committee is pleased to give reasons why they oppose the long-petted idol of the management of this arsenal.

We contend that a system or systems, regardless of names, that do not offer equal opportunities to all, that give a few persons advantages at the expense of the many, is very unjust and merits our new name, "infernal imp," until our friends supply us with a better name, to wit, "annihilation."

The secretary will give a few extracts of a letter sent a few days ago to the Congressman of this district, Hon. F. W. DALLINGER.

This is our first example: When the time has been set on a job and another person is put to do the work, perhaps a little more efficient and the conditions more favorable, and he is cut, cut, and cut until very little is left for adverse circumstances, what of efficiency? And should a helper be called upon to assist under such condition he is made a double slave, being the slave of a slave for $2 a day only, not more than enough for his own personal use nowadays, regardless of the special advice of our ex-President Roosevelt to raise large families—yes; on empty dinner pails.

We will take another example: When the "unskilled labor," so called, getting a wage of $2 to $2.24 a day, is put to do the work of mechanics, the only difference being in wage and premium, which is nearly half in favor of the mechanic, what of the boasted efficiency?

I asked a machinist that makes big premium what is meant by the "bonus system," to which he replied, "I do not know, unless it is the two-thirds premium that is taken out of our 'bones' to benefit the useless."

The writer some months ago was put to slushing the finished parts of a gun carriage in order for shipping. My pay was 25 cents per hour, and I was allowed 96 hours short time on the job, viz, 96 hours at 25 cents, making $24. I received one-third of the whole amount, it being $8. You will kindly bear in mind that the slushing premium slip called for slushing only. Yet afterwards I was compelled to do painting along with the slushing, all on the slushing premium slip, each part taking about half my time and energy, so that thereafter I only got about $5 on the job instead of $8, the balance going to another party. After complaining of this injustice I was soon removed from the erecting shop to the machine department, where I am still working for a wage "only" of $2 a day, and am expected to support a family of five on that amount, and the price of living is still rising. To whom shall I look for advice?

Since I have been on this job several unmarried men, I am pleased to say, have been promoted to machine operators, getting an increase in wages, etc., and they should have very much more. But strange to say, as it is nothing has been done for the men supporting families. When transferred I was told that they required a good man in the machine shop. So I am here ever since and practically starving because of my efficiency. My wife, who is sick by the environment, has to do washing and beg to get along. What can the public think of the Taylor system of administration at this arsenal? For the system can only be known by its management.

Many things on this line should be exposed that condemn the system, and I know of nothing of mutual interest that commend it.

A man told me to-day because of sickness he was discharged after working here for 30 years. But friendly aid had him reinstated. Then in two or three months his pay was reduced to $1.50 a day.

Four men were put to unload two cars of coke and one car of sand, and three of the men received premium on the job and the fourth man received none. Then the fourth and same person was put to unload a car of coal, which he did in five minutes less than short time, and he was told again he would not receive premium. This shows the administration of the system to us.

Now, if our worthy Congressmen can yield to the question, we will present our last example and let their good judgment decide as to which of the three names is the most appropriate for such a creature.

A poor man working in the yard was crushed by falling shot, breaking his leg in three places, etc., where he was left for over one hour in that mangled condition before receiving proper care or attention.

The safety-first notices are plenty, yet the rush and tear for premium makes danger imminent to all.

Our committee kindly submits best wishes to Congress for relief, desiring earnestly to have the "square deal" exchanged immediately for a "straight deal."

WATERTOWN, MASS., June 8, 1916.

Hon. JOHN I. NOLAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter, we, the undersigned, unskilled and underpaid workers in this Watertown Arsenal, petition for the Nolan bill to be made a law at the earliest moment. We also make an emphatic protest against the entire Taylor premium system as used in this arsenal, and earnestly petition to have it abolished, as stated in our letter to you May 29, 1916.

Mr. NOLAN. I tried to illustrate here the other day that this system is nothing more nor less than an opportunity on the part of the efficiency experts to wipe out the piecework system, that was obnoxious because it had a tendency to speed up the workers, but under the piecework system the employee got for the last piece upon which he was employed the same amount of money he got for the first piece, while under this bonus and premium system the task is 100 per cent, and if a man should do an extra 100 per cent he would receive 33⅓ per cent of the amount for the second 100 per cent that he received for the first 100 per cent, the employer or the Government in this instance taking 66⅔ per cent of his earnings. That is the bonus and premium system as illustrated under the Taylor system of scientific management and practiced in the Watertown Arsenal. I want to call attention to the fact that all of the propaganda that has been going throughout this country is due to the fact that 8 or 10 scientific-management experts and efficiency engineers have established a bureau in New York and have been collecting sums of money and circularizing the country, and 9 out of every 10 men, and 9 out of every 10 institutions, that have been petitioning Members of Congress do not know what the Taylor system is, never had it installed in their workshops, because the men will not work under it.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want to ask the gentleman how large a proportion of the employees in the Watertown Arsenal are those 190 of which he speaks?

Mr. NOLAN. This is the organization of the unskilled workers. One hundred and ninety unskilled workers sent this petition. We have petitions from the machinists, the molders, the blacksmiths, the pattern makers, and practically every trade in the arsenal, protesting against the introduction of this system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

[By unanimous consent Mr. NOLAN was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DALLINGER to the amendment by Mr. TAVENNER: Add at the end thereof the following words:

"The prohibitions contained in this proviso, however, shall not apply to the work done in any department of a Government arsenal where a majority of the employees of said department shall request the commanding officer of said arsenal in writing to establish in said department an efficiency system or to continue therein any efficiency system which may then be in operation in said department."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I have an arsenal in my district, the Watertown Arsenal, to which the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has just referred. I have spent a good deal of time during the last two or three months in trying to find out what are the real wishes of the men who work in that arsenal and who live in my district, and I have tried various methods and have collected quite a lot of information. There are a good many men in the arsenal who believe in the Taylor system, or in some system of efficiency. On the other hand, there are other men who are opposed to it. It seems to me extraordinary that this Congress should pass an amendment in this form to prohibit any efficiency system in any arsenal, even if all of the men ask for it. My amendment provides that if a majority of the men in any department request in writing the commanding officer of that arsenal to have the system retained or a new system adopted, then it shall be done, and the prohibitions contained in the Tavenner amendment shall not apply. Nothing could be fairer than that. In those private concerns where efficiency methods have been inaugurated it has been done with the cooperation of the men, and where it has been done with the cooperation of the men it has been successful. The trouble with the Taylor system in some of these arsenals is that the men were never consulted in regard to it, and the result is there has been antagonism, the men have not cooperated, and no system can be successful without the hearty cooperation of the men. If this amendment is adopted, it gives the men in any department a chance to ask for it, if they so desire. If the other men do not want it, they need not have it. That is the whole substance of it. It seems to me that we ought to adopt some such amendment as this and not say in this grave crisis in the Nation's affairs that no efficiency system shall be allowed in Government arsenals, regardless of what the men who work in them desire. If this very fair amendment which I have offered is not adopted, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER].

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present this letter from a committee of machinists employed at the Watertown Arsenal, and have it read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I am very heartily in favor of all legislation that might be for the benefit or for the uplift of labor, and I would like to have the gentleman answer the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. TAVENNER. I will yield to the gentleman—how many minutes?

Mr. FOCHT. I would like for the gentleman to answer it; the gentleman is advocating this.

Mr. TAVENNER. I will answer it. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have that letter read.

The CHAIRMAN. In the gentleman's time?

Mr. TAVENNER. In my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY, 11 FAIRFIELD STREET,
Watertown, Mass., May 31, 1916.

Hon. CLYDE H. TAVENNER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned committee, representing over 95 per cent of the machinists employed at the Watertown Arsenal, have been authorized by the employees concerned to advise Congress, through you, that the provisions of House bill 8665, or any clauses having a similar intent, incorporated in appropriation bills and providing for the abolition of elemental time study and the premium or bonus system of payment at the Watertown Arsenal, are favored by these employees.

It has been brought to our attention that an impression is prevalent in some quarters in Washington that the employees at the Watertown Arsenal do not object to the Taylor system. We wish to assure you that this is absolutely untrue. At least 95 per cent of the employees would have this system abolished to-morrow if it were possible, and common sense shop practice substituted in its place. It is true that a few individuals have taken it upon themselves to write Members of Congress, stating that they favor the system.

We are aware that the foremen at the arsenal have presented a form letter to a number of the workmen and have requested them to forward a copy of it on to Congress. Their wishes may have been complied with, but these are only exceptions.

A few of the employees who have been especially favored in securing liberal premiums on good jobs may be willing to fasten this system on all the rest of the employees in order to retain their advantage, but they have no authority to speak for anyone else but themselves.

We wish to advise you that our views are correctly represented by the attitude of the American Federation of Labor and through our personal representative, N. P. Alifas. While we have referred Members of Congress to an efficiency engineer by the name of Minor Chipman as an authority on the evil conditions existing at the Watertown Arsenal, we have not accepted his views as to what action should be taken to relieve the situation.

We are advised that he is opposing this legislation. He has no authority from us to do this, and we hope the distinction will be understood. Mr. Chipman has severely criticized the system in operation at the Watertown Arsenal. In this we agree with him; we do not, however, agree that the particular system which he may desire to have introduced is any better. We understand that he is also advocating scientific management and is in favor of the very things that we are so earnestly protesting against, namely, the elemental time study and the premium or bonus systems.

We deny that the premium system is of any financial advantage since we do not consider that we are getting the prevailing wage scale in private employ in this vicinity, unless the premium is included with our daily wage. Our daily earnings, including premium and all, are no more than Government institutions in this vicinity are paying for straight daywork.

You can rest assured that at least 95 per cent of the employees at this arsenal will be glad to see your bill passed and the Taylor system discontinued for all time.

Thanking you for your earnest efforts in our behalf, we are,

Very respectfully, yours,

G. W. GREENWOOD,
H. H. BEATON,
A. LE ROY,
Committee of machinists employed at Watertown Arsenal.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 3 minutes in the reading of the letter, making 18 in all used by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TAVENNER. I would like to have the other side use some time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating some letters and telegrams I have received on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, permission is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. GORDON. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I believe that this whole opposition to time study and premium payments as prescribed in the Taylor system is based upon a misapprehension. I have given some time and attention to a personal investigation of this question, and I am convinced that there is no legitimate objection to the Taylor system where I have seen it applied. I have seen it in operation, and I can not for the life of me see why any man who is willing to have his employer know, and to know himself, how much product he turns out in a given time should be opposed to this system. This is undertaking to enact into law the leveling system of socialism to an extent greater than any proposition that I have ever seen before a legislative body. Why if you have a number of men in your employ and one turns out more of a given product than the other should not he receive more money for his work?

Mr. TAVENNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. No. [Laughter.] I have only five minutes, and how can I yield? I would like to have the gentleman answer that question; he has not answered it yet, but answer it in his own time, of course. [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] starts his speech by saying that the object of the Taylor system is to speed up a man to the highest pitch and then require all the men to conform to the standard thus established. Now, I submit in all fairness, is there a man in this House who believes that statement is true?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. GORDON. Does the Government of the United States have in its employ to-day any foreman or superintendent who would use the men under him in that way? If it has, he ought to be discharged forthwith. I deny it absolutely. That is not the purpose of the Taylor system. If you want to stand over your men with a whip and compel them to work to the highest pitch, you do not need the Taylor system or any other system to do it; all you need to do is to stand there and watch them.

The object of this amendment is to prohibit all means and methods of time measurement and premium payments. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN], the labor leader here, says that the men are not opposed to time measurement, that they are willing to have their employers know how much they do in a given time. That is all the Taylor system does. I can not for the life of me see why any honest man who works for a living should object to having his employer know how much work he does in a given time. If he does an honest day's work he will receive a day's pay. If he does more than the average man does he will receive more than a day's pay. Now, this system is in operation among many of the leading manufacturing establishments in the city of Cleveland, Ohio. I shall insert in the RECORD some letters from those gentlemen and others, and I have not received a single objection or protest from anyone in Cleveland against time measurement and premium payments. I have personally investigated it, and I undertake to say the largest cloak and clothing manufacturing establishment in the United States, in the city of Cleveland, applies this system. I have visited their plant and talked with their men, and I understand they pay the highest wages of any similar establishment in the United States, and they have that system. If there is any opposition to it there I have never learned of it. Not opposed to any time-measuring device? A time-measuring device is a method—I do not care whether you call it a stop watch or any other kind of a watch—by which you determine how much time is required to turn out a given product or any constituent part of that product, and pay men on that basis for what they do. That is a time-measuring device. [Applause.] What is the objection to it?

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
Congressman from Ohio, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Tavenner bill (H. R. 8665) and the Van Dyke bill (H. R. 8677) would, we believe, place a great handicap upon governmental activities. One of the reasons for our industrial progress is that private manufacturers are making use of the most approved and efficient methods, and any other course would place our industries out of the running in world competition. We would consider it most unfortunate if Congress should by these laws deprive the Federal Government of the benefit of methods which the industrial world looks upon with favor. Outside of the fact that this legislation would do an injustice to the more efficient mechanics, expenditures would also be increased in any preparedness program.

It is our hope that you will oppose the Tavenner and Van Dyke bills.

Very truly, yours,

NATIONAL CARBON CO.,
J. S. CRIDER,

CLEVELAND, OHIO, June 20, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: It hardly seems necessary for us to write you and register our protest against the adoption of the Tavenner amendment to the fortifications bill, which is under consideration before the House of Representatives at the present time, as we do not believe that you favor the adoption of the Tavenner amendment at this time when industrial preparedness is receiving so much attention. We do not believe that there can be any danger of laws being favorably acted upon by the present House of Representatives that would so handicap this Government and establish precedent for other similar laws to follow later on.

Yours, very truly,

EFFICIENCY SOCIETY,
New York, June 19, 1916.

To Members of Congress:

Under date of January 21, 1916, before his elevation to the Supreme Court, Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, an eminent advocate of the workers, wrote us as follows:

"Referring to the proposed congressional legislation to prohibit the introduction or use of time study and premium payments in Government establishments:

"In my opinion any such restriction upon the conduct of Government establishments would be highly inadvisable. The purpose for thus proposing the legislation is doubtless one which all of us would approve. Increased efficiency ought not to be purchased at the expense of health and other qualities essential to good citizenship and the general welfare, but no one can doubt that increased efficiency is essential to the public welfare; that we have not yet learned how best to secure that efficiency; and that the most important element in securing efficiency is the knowledge of facts—to the ascertainment of which time study is a means.

"To prohibit time study and premium payment is as crude a method of affording to the workingman proper protection as the proverbial 'burning of the house to roast the pig.'"

We respectfully request you to consider this in connection with the Van Dyke and Tavenner bills and appropriation riders.

Yours, truly,

A. W. KIMBER, Secretary.

THE GREAVES-KLUSMAN TOOL CO.,
Cincinnati, Ohio, June 19, 1916.

Hon. WM. GORDON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR. We learn that an antiefficiency rider similar to the one placed on the naval appropriation bill will be introduced by Mr. TAVENNER as part of the fortifications bill to come before the House Tuesday, June 20. This measure would not be popular in Cincinnati.

A vote in Cincinnati shops by men operating under premium or bonus plans would be overwhelmingly in favor of their retention, and we believe this opinion prevails generally throughout the State of Ohio.

Compensation must be based upon production.

Premium and bonus plans afford opportunity for each individual to increase his earnings in proportion to his merit. Ohio has always been a progressive State. Its industrial laws rank foremost amongst those of the States of the Union. Its manufacturers and its artisans cooperate in large measure for the betterment of each.

To write into the laws of the country a measure such as has been added to the naval bill and is proposed to be added to the fortifications bill, characterizing as criminal methods of compensation which are the result of years of study, both by employee and employer in this State, is to stultify the intelligence of both and would undoubtedly meet with their earnest disapproval.

We earnestly ask you to vote to strike out the Tavenner rider.

Very sincerely, yours,

S. H. RECK.

GERMAN-AMERICAN BUTTON CO.,
Executive Offices, Rochester, N. Y., June 21, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM GORDON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We want to appeal to you to oppose the legislation before Congress aimed to prevent the use of time study and the stop watch in Government work and premium payments to Government workmen. This proposal is based on absolute and utter misunderstanding. The stop watch or some time-measuring device is essential to the determination of rates that are really accurate and fair to the worker. It is used only to determine the rates. It is never held over the operator afterwards, and once rates are determined its use ceases.

Bonus and premium payments are a true recognition of efficiency and mean sharing with the worker the savings effected. Proposed legislation appears in Tavenner House bill, also Van Dyke post-office bill, and naval appropriation bill as reported. To approve this anti-efficiency legislation would be a crime and surely a grave injustice to American labor. Workers in plants where rates are correctly established by scientific time studies and where proper bonus payments are given will all strongly approve and indorse their use.

Very truly, yours,

GERMAN-AMERICAN BUTTON CO.,
HENRY T. NOYES, Treasurer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to consume only one moment to bring out the fact with reference to the statements that every employee will receive exactly the same wage under the amendment I have offered. That is a mistaken impression. I will read from a statement of Col. Wheeler, the commandant at the Frankford Arsenal, who, when testifying before a special committee of the House three or four years ago, said:

We have at present 146 machinists, 1 receiving $3.68 per day, 5 receiving $3.52 per day, 27 receiving $3.28 per day, 65 receiving $3.04 per day, 33 receiving $2.80 per day, 14 receiving $2.56 per day, and 1 receiving $2.40 per day.

Thus it will be seen that the arsenal workers are graded, the men in the different grades receiving a different scale. The pending amendment does not in any way interfere with this custom.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman know a man by the name of Henry Ford in the United States?

Mr. TAVENNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman made any investigation of the character of the time system he employs in the making of automobiles?

Mr. TAVENNER. I know something about it. He uses the good parts of it and not the man-killing parts. This amendment does not in any way affect the sane and reasonable features of efficiency systems. Standardization and the systemization are not in any way affected by this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. If my colleague will allow me to suggest——

Mr. TAVENNER. I have only a few minutes, and have given all remaining time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING]. The gentleman can get time from the other side, however.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TAVENNER. I have not any more time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in good faith?

Mr. TAVENNER. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. CANNON. I will be glad to know, inasmuch as I have listened with great interest to the gentleman, how it is ascertained that several men get $3.60, if that is what they do get, and some machinists get only $2.70?

Mr. TAVENNER. That is explained here, but I have not the time to read it. I understand that a man's production, steadiness in employment, sobriety, and general efficiency are taken into consideration in determining ratings. For instance, there are some men—old men who have worked for the Government a great many years—not able now, perhaps, to do as much work as when they were younger and stronger, and the commandant of the arsenal does not want to discharge them, and he puts them in the lowest grade and pays them at a lower rate than other men who are at the height of their usefulness.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me?

Mr. TAVENNER. I regret I can not yield any more. My time has been given to others.

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask a question in good faith, in order to determine how I shall vote.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to abolish an efficiency system which has been used by the Government, especially in the Watertown Arsenal, for over six years. That system has been approved by every Secretary of War, Republican and Democrat, that we have had since it was inaugurated. The present Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, is strongly in favor of it, as was his predecessor, Mr. Garrison. Now, I am opposed on principle to Congress interfering with the administration of a great department of the Government or with the methods of a great department of the Government, especially when those methods are approved by the greatest efficiency experts in the world. The head of a Government department is charged with the responsibility of conducting that department in an efficient manner, and when Congress comes in and wishes to interfere with the administration or the methods of a department it ought to be very positive that it is right.

Now, this question, Mr. Chairman, is a good deal a question of fact. What are the facts? Is this system a benefit to the Government or is it not? Is it injurious to the Government employee or not? The question is whether we can rely upon the heads of our great departments; the testimony of the superintendents of these shops; the testimony of the Secretary of War upon the facts regarding the use of the time-study and the premium system.

Now, the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, has written the Speaker of this House that this system is working well in the Watertown Arsenal. He says that it would be a serious mistake to abolish it. He also says to the Speaker of this House, in a letter that has been published in the RECORD, that the men are not overworked, that their health has not been impaired in the least, that it does not injure the men in any way, but, on the contrary, that this system is beneficial to the men. He also testifies that every man in the Watertown Arsenal under this premium system is not only getting his day's wages the same as are provided by other shops, but he is getting on an average over $10 a month more by reason of these premiums.

These are some of the facts the Secretary of War gives us, and Gen. Crozier, the head of the Ordnance Department, corroborates him. These facts can not be successfully contradicted. If we believe these Government officials when they say that the time study is working successfully and is beneficial to the Government in increasing the output and to the men in raising their wages, what good reason is there for Congress to abolish it?

What is a time study, and what is it used for? A time study is employed simply to ascertain the best way of doing a job. There may be three or four mechanics on similar jobs, all doing it in different ways. They put time watches upon them to see which is the best, the quickest, and most efficient way of doing that piece of work. The time study is employed often in determining not only the best way of doing the work but the machine best adapted to it. You can do the same piece of work on different machines. The time study is made of doing a piece of work on these different machines to see which machine is best adapted for that piece of work and upon which machine it can be done in the most efficient and quickest way. It is a serious thing to abolish all time study. In doing so you prevent getting the accurate knowledge that is necessary in order to obtain the cost of any article manufactured. In fact, the day plan is a time study, but when a certain work does not take a day, but so many minutes or hours, a time study is very necessary. You take it in the paper mills. Here is a man who goes to work to operate a paper machine that costs $75,000. The employer wants to know the man who can work the machine most efficiently, and so tries different men on it. One man can operate efficiently one machine and not another. If they are allowed to make a time study, they can easily find out the right man for the right machine, and thus place the man where the is most efficient.

Gen. Crozier says the use of the time study has not resulted in throwing men out of employment, but in shifting men about, and by means of it he has been able to get the right man for the right job and has thereby increased the output of his arsenals nearly 100 per cent. What is the premium system? The premium system simply provides that if a man does more than just simply an average day's work he is entitled to get pay for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not the premium or bonus system in nearly all cases offset by a system of penalties and fines?

Mr. BROWNE. Not in the Watertown Arsenal. I want to say here that the Watertown Arsenal has been investigated two or three times, and no investigating committee has said that we ought to abolish this system that this bill proposes to abolish. And when in the last Congress we passed a law which we thought would abolish the time study and the premium system in the Watertown and other arsenals, it caused great dissatisfaction among the men themselves. I have the testimony here of Gen. Crozier to prove this statement. A large petition, signed by several hundred workmen, who were against the abolition of the premium system, was presented to him asking him to retain the premium system. This petition can be found in my minority report on the Tavenner bill, pages 39 and 40.

If you abolish the premium system, you simply offer no incentive to a man to do more than an average day's work, no matter how strong and capable he may be. What is the result of that? If a man does not get any pay for doing his best, he simply works more slowly, and, as a result, the slowest man on your job sets the pace for your whole shop. In my opinion the only hope for labor, the only hope for shorter hours and increased wages, is in efficiency, increasing the output of an establishment. That was shown in the Watertown Arsenal. When Gen. Crozier adopted this system over six years ago, he increased the output very greatly. He claims he increased the output 100 per cent. As a result, the men are getting premiums, an average premium of over $10 a month. The men are also getting an 8-hour workday and 15 days' leave of absence with full pay and 13 Saturday afternoons off, besides the usual legal holidays. This does not look like oppression.

My friends say that Gen. Crozier and the Secretary of War, if they are allowed to use the time-study and premium systems, systems that are used by private manufacturers all over the land to the satisfaction of themselves and their employees, they are going to oppress the laboring men working under them. If the men in those high positions were mean enough to oppress the laboring man and abuse a system of that kind, here is a safeguard; we already have a law in which we provide for arbitration. Any man in the Watertown Arsenal or any of the other arsenals, if he has a grievance, can have his grievance placed before an arbitration board and can have it arbitrated there. If he does not like the decision, he can appeal to Gen. Crozier. If he does not like Gen. Crozier's decision, he can appeal to the Secretary of War. And I want to say right here, Mr. Chairman, that in the six years that they have had the time study and the premium system in the Watertown Arsenal there has not been a single appeal on the ground that the men have been overworked or overspeeded or that the time-study or premium system were oppressive. The only argument made against the premium system by the men who oppose it on this floor is that the premium that the Government offers for efficiency is going to overstimulate the laboring man. Let us look at that for a minute. If a premium is going to overstimulate a laboring man and make him work too hard, would not that same man, if he was working for himself, have the same incentive to hurry up and speed up as he would if he was working for a premium? [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Nine minutes.

Mr. MANN. And how much on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes.

Mr. TAVENNER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VAN DYKE].

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to direct the attention of the House to a speech found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 3, made by myself upon this subject as it relates to the Post Office Department. It has been tried out in that department and found to be wanting. On a test taken on Friday, October 15, 1915, out of a total of 206 men only 72 measured up to the standard and 134 fell below the standard. That test was taken at Cincinnati.

I do not believe it is the purpose of Congress to enact legislation that will allow economy in any branch of the service when the very best service to the public is not obtained. It is only a few years ago that in this same branch of the service speed tests were put into operation. This was tried out and found wanting. For reasons hereinbefore stated, it was found that it was a very impractical proposition.

By an order effective May 25, 1915, signed by Mr. J. P. Johnston, the general superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, the "speed test" was officially rejected.

This order of the general superintendent was issued following a unanimous recommendation made by all of the division superintendents of the Railway Mail Service. The division superintendents in conference adopted a resolution advising that for service reasons the "speed test" be discontinued.

One of the division superintendents who participated in this conference made the following statement:

> After considering the question thoroughly, we decided that it was for the best interests not only of the service but of the clerks as well that the speed tests be abolished as a part of our efficiency rating system.

Mr. TAVENNER. Do the other side wish to consume any more of their time just now?

Mr. MANN. Will there be only one more speech over there?

Mr. TAVENNER. One more.

Mr. MANN. I yield the remainder of my time, five minutes, to my colleague [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is recognized for five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. You can not standardize men by law, and you ought not to try to do it. There ought not to be anything done to prevent men from making the best they can of themselves. [Applause.] When you take away from a man the incentive to make progress you stop the wheels of enterprise, and this law or any other law similar to it ought not to be enacted, for it will do just that. I asked my colleague [Mr. TAVENNER] if he knew a man named Henry Ford and whether Henry Ford applied some system to ascertain what it costs him to make automobiles. He would not let me get that into the question. I will tell you what Henry Ford does. He puts his automobiles on an endless chain, and the men who assemble them must work just as fast as the chain moves. Yet he pays the highest wages that are paid by any man who employs labor. There is no objection to Henry Ford's system by my colleague; no, not a bit. Why should there be any objection to the system employed by the Government of the United States? Once I worked for 50 cents a day myself. I worked at a trade. If I had been compelled then, as you seek to compel men now, not to try to make progress, I would still be working at the trade. [Applause.] You want to make every man get the same standard of wages. You do not allow an employer to pay one man less than another is paid. The man who can do the job in 6 hours does not work half as hard as the man who works 8 and even 12 hours to do the same job. I know that, because I have tried it. The man who can do the job in 6 hours has a scientific knowledge of his business and he does not have to work hard. He uses his brain; but the other man has not the capacity and can not become an expert, hence he must work hard because he does not possess the scientific knowledge and can not acquire it. Now, the men who have made their mark in the world are the men who have used their heads and who have not been restricted in their right to use them. Do you want progress among the human race? All right; leave them free to compete with each other, and let the best man win. I could not run a foot race with some of you men, but I might be able to beat you in some other way. Now, in the line where I am superior to you I ought to have a right to take advantage of my superiority. In the line where you are superior to me you ought to have that same right, and there ought not to be any statute law written to prevent men from making progress. Why, you will have them all on a level. You will send them back to the Paleozoic age, where everybody was a savage, where civilization was unknown, and where progress was never thought of. What makes men great? It is their ability to do things better than anybody else. What makes a man valuable? His value depends entirely upon his ability to do a thing that somebody else can not do, or to do it better than somebody else does it, or to do it more cheaply than somebody else does it.

And that does not mean that he is a slave; not at all. It means that he is able to keep pace with the onward march of civilization and is able to successfully compete with those who are engaged in the same line of endeavor that he is from all over the world. I want to say to you that legislation of this kind is un-American and ought not to be adopted. [Applause.] You do not help labor by the passage of such legislation; you hurt it. Every man should be encouraged to better his condition, to elevate himself. You can not make men by law. You should not by law prevent them from making themselves. I want to see ability recognized wherever found, whether in the sewer, on the farm, in the machine shop, in the Congress, or in the White House. [Applause.]

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that most of those who are opposing the amendment offered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER] want to use the stop watch on other men, and that those who are supporting the amendment have had the stop watch used on them. That is the issue, my friends, clear and distinct.

Back of the opposition to this amendment stands Mr. J. A. Emery, of the National Association of Manufacturers. During the last Congress, after the Mulhall investigation had suspended Mr. Emery's activities, this identical amendment was placed on the Army and Navy bills without a protest. This year, Mr. Emery, acting for the National Association of Manufacturers, has stirred up opposition to this proposition.

In the time allotted to me I can not do more than answer one or two suggestions which have been submitted. Let me say, first of all, that there is nothing in this amendment which prevents the adoption of an efficiency system—absolutely nothing. The only thing this amendment does is to prevent the use of a stop watch and the premium and bonus system; and when gentlemen tell you that it prevents the adoption of an efficiency system in any branch of the Government service, they are either attempting to deceive you or they do not know what they are talking about.

As evidence of that, let me call your attention to the fact that the Navy Department in the navy yards of this country has an efficiency system, which I submitted to this House a few days ago, covering 16 pages of printed matter, and not a word in it about a stop watch or the premium or bonus system. A great many efficiency engineers declare that the use of the stop watch on a human being does not make for efficiency, but, on the contrary, makes for inefficiency, that it destroys the human machine.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] said that his vote depended on the question of how you could determine whether a man was worth $2.50 or $3.50 or $4 unless you used a watch. If his vote depends on that, we have his vote right now. There is not an efficient foreman in this country, there is not an efficient superintendent in this country, who does not now in actual practice grade his men. There is nothing in this amendment which prevents one workman getting more than another workman in the same shop. That proposition would be determined, as it has been for centuries, by efficient superintendents, guided by the skill and productivity of employees, determining that John Smith should have $2.50 a day, Mike Kelly $3 a day, and some one else $3.50 a day. That is the common practice among employers all over the land.

Now, my friend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] has referred to the cloak makers of Cleveland. He has investigated their condition, he says, but I wonder if he knows that the men who used to work in the cloak industry in Cleveland attempted to form unions and were driven out by the advocates of the stop-watch system and their places taken by women?

Mr. GORDON. I do not, and it is not true.

Mr. KEATING. It is, and if the gentleman will investigate it he will ascertain those facts.

Mr. GORDON. But I know better.

Mr. BROWNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. No; I have not the time. The gentleman from Massachusetts offered an amendment providing that if the employees in the arsenal shall petition for the "stop-watch" and premium and bonus systems they shall be granted. I am opposed to that proposition being tacked onto this amendment, and I will tell you why.

In January, 1915, when we attached the antistop-watch riders to the Army and Navy bills Gen. Crozier wired to the commandant of the Frankford Arsenal and told him to suspend the payment of all premiums and bonuses. That was almost six months before the law took effect, and before it had been passed by the Senate of the United States.

It has been testified to on the floor of this House by a distinguished Member of this body that the foremen in that arsenal went to women who had been getting $1.45 and $1.75 a day under the premium system by exerting themselves to the limit of human endeavor and told them that if these riders became law their salaries would be cut to $1.16 a day. "And," said the foreman, "you will have to turn out just as much as you did when you were paid $1.50 or $1.75 a day."

It was under that kind of pressure that the employees of the arsenal sent to Congress the protest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has read here. After the antistop-watch rider had become law this same Gen. Crozier boasted before the Labor Committee that he had discovered a scheme by which he could nullify the evident intent of Congress. If you adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Gen. Crozier will put the screws to every employee in every arsenal under his jurisdiction and force them to sign petitions asking for the installation of the stop-watch system.

I am not willing that we should give Gen. Crozier a further opportunity to oppress the men and women who are subject to his orders.

I want Congress to write into these appropriation bills provisions which are so clear they can not be evaded.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that both amendments may be again reported.

The Clerk again reported the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 92, noes 88.

Mr. KEATING. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 95.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 111, noes 94.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14303, the fortifications appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Before the votes are taken on the fortifications appropriation bill and the amendments thereto, with the consent of the House the Chair desires to make two or three remarks. There are three rules in this House that are habitually violated, generally, the Chair thinks, without any intention of doing so. One of them is that a Member from his seat shall not inject remarks into the speech of the gentleman who has the floor. To do so works for bad order. Half the time the Member who is making the speech is so busy making it that he does not catch the exact remark that the man sitting in his seat makes, and it does not give the Member who has the floor a fair chance. The Chair intends to enforce that rule rigidly from now on, no matter who violates it. [Applause.]

Another rule of the House is that Members shall not crowd about the Clerk's desk when the roll is being called. Members keep coming up and disturbing the Clerk during a roll call, asking whether they are recorded, or how they are recorded, or desiring to be recorded when they have no right to be recorded. It casts suspicion upon the integrity of the proceedings.

Third, Members ought not to put their feet on top of the benches in front of them. It makes a bad impression on everyone.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Tavenner amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the Tavenner amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 197, nays 117, answering "present" 14, not voting 106, as follows:

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. KENNEDY. I voted "aye." I desire to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. TAGUE was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague from Virginia, Mr. SLEMP. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. GLASS was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with my colleague, Mr. MCFADDEN, who is ill. I voted "no." I desire to change my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. DEWALT was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time: was read the third time.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. CALDWELL. I am opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL moves to recommit the bill, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

"Page 3, line 17, after the figures '$1,400,000' insert: 'Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as authorizing the payment of any money for land on Rockaway Peninsula, N. Y., to which the United States has title or a claim of title until the same has been adjudicated adversely to the United States: And provided further, That no more than $2,000 per acre shall be paid unless a larger sum shall have first been determined to be the value thereof in a condemnation award.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Nine gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 165, noes 9.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the reporter to record the fact to go in the RECORD that the Speaker signs this warrant for H. Snowden Marshall in the presence of the House.

The Chair does not think it necessary but some gentlemen did.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OLNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the efficiency of the Department of Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the efficiency of the Department of Commerce. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, on the request of Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. Moss of West Virginia was granted indefinite leave of absence on account of illness.

NATIONAL PARK, TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] rise?

Mr. FERRIS. I desire to call up the bill H. R. 9525, the Hawaiian park bill, to ask to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to call up the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9525) to establish a national park in the Territory of Hawaii.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. FERRIS, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. LENROOT.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15836, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15836, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15836) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose Monday evening tellers had been ordered on a vote on an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 65, after line 6, insert "For the improvement of Government-owned roads within the arsenal grounds, $10,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, tellers had been ordered on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, Mr. SANFORD, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. FITZGERALD, will take their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Repairs of arsenals: For repairs and improvements at arsenals, and to meet such unforeseen expenditures as accidents or other contingencies during the year may render necessary, including $150,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for machinery for manufacturing purposes in the arsenals, $300,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARTERMASTER CORPS.

Military posts: For the construction and enlargement at military posts of such buildings as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be necessary, including the installation therein of plumbing and of heating and lighting apparatus; but no part of this sum shall be used for the purchase of land for construction of buildings at Coast Artillery posts, nor for the establishment of any disciplinary barracks, $127,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope that what I say will not precipitate any partisan debate. Of course we have to supply barracks for soldiers. Whether the allowance is sufficient, of course I do not undertake to say. I am not sure where the soldiers will be during the next fiscal year.

I have in my hand one of the afternoon papers, the Washington Times, making a statement which, I think, is worthy to be called to the attention of the House and to the country. It is a little article following a conference with President Wilson to-day by Postmaster General Burleson. Burleson stated that this Government had not yet learned who is to blame for the Carrizal fight between the Carranzistas and the American troops. Until that is determined, he said, "no course of action can be decided upon."

It says:

Although Burleson declared he had not talked anything but politics with the President, he and Secretary of War Baker were in the President's office at the same time, and upon leaving the White House Burleson said—

And I am assuming, at least, for the purpose of calling attention to the matter, that what Burleson is reputed to have said—and it is put in quotation marks in the article—may be somewhere near correct. Burleson said:

We have not yet been informed who is to blame for this latest Mexican trouble. If it is learned that Americans were to blame, that Americans precipitated the fight, then I think we should have the courage to admit it. If the Mexicans were to blame—well, then, that would mean more talk.

If the Americans were to blame, we will apologize; if the Mexicans were to blame in murdering our troops, we will continue to talk. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, civilian employees, etc.: For interment, or of preparation and transportation to their homes or to such national cemeteries as may be designated by proper authority, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, of the remains of officers including acting assistant surgeons, and enlisted men of the Army active list; interment, or of preparation and transportation to their homes, of the remains of civil employees of the Army in the employ of the War Department who die abroad, in Alaska, in the Canal Zone, or on Army transports, or who die while on duty in the field or at military posts within the limits of the United States; interment of military prisoners who die at military posts; removal of remains from abandoned posts to permanent military posts or national cemeteries, including the remains of Federal soldiers, sailors, or marines, interred in fields or abandoned private and city cemeteries; and in any case where the expense of burial or shipment of the remains of officers or enlisted men of the Army who die on the active list are borne by individuals, where such expenses would have been lawful claims against the Government, reimbursement to such individuals may be made of the amount allowed by the Government for such services out of this sum, but no reimbursement shall be made of such expenses incurred prior to July 1, 1910, $57,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 70, line 17, by striking out the word "expense" and inserting the word "expenses."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Gettysburg National Park: For continuing the establishment of the park; acquisition of lands, surveys, and maps; constructing, improving, and maintaining avenues, roads, and bridges thereon; fences and gates; marking the lines of battle with tablets and guns, each tablet bearing a brief legend giving historic facts and compiled without censure and without praise; preserving the features of the battle field and the monuments thereon; compensation of civilian commissioners, clerical and other services, expenses, and labor; purchase and preparation of tablets and gun carriages and placing them in position; and all other expenses incidental to the foregoing, $42,500.

Mr. BEALES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 73, line 12, strike out the figures "$42,500" and insert "$57,500, of which $15,000 shall be expended to improve unfinished portions of roadway within the limits of the park."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BEALES. Mr. Chairman, the amount of money I ask for in addition to the amount appropriated in the bill was the amount I asked for in the early days of the session. It is for the Emmittsburg Road and the Taneytown Road. It has the approval of the chairman of the commission and the Secretary of War, and was reported to the House and put upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There seems to be an objection to this bill passing under unanimous consent, for the reason that it carries with it an appropriation. I ask therefore an amount.

Mr. BAILEY. What roads are these?

Mr. BEALES. They are the Emmittsburg Road and the Taneytown Road, within the borders of the national park, and have been given to the United States Government by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BAILEY. What is the length of these roadways?

Mr. BEALES. Thirty-five hundred feet on each one to the limits of the national park.

Mr. BAILEY. And further, if this $15,000 were appropriated, would it not complete the drive?

Mr. BEALES. It would complete the road to where the State of Pennsylvania takes it up and makes a macadam road out of it. This portion of the road for which I have asked the appropriation has already been ceded to the United States Government by the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BENNET. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this matter was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs and then favorably reported to the House?

Mr. BEALES. Yes, sir; and has the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BENNET. And the commissioners who have charge of this park?

Mr. BEALES. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law the commission has absolutely the say as to how this money should be expended, and any such attempt as this is legislation and is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New York what authority he has for saying it would be out of order to appropriate the sums, putting a limitation on the appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it would control the discretion, as this does, of the authority that has the expenditure of the money.

Mr. HAY. That would apply to every sum that was appropriated. If that is true, it would not direct an appropriation bill in the expenditure of any particular sum. If there was an appropriation made of a lump sum, the Chair would like to see what authority the gentleman from New York may have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not any authority just now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. Does the gentleman from New York want to submit an authority?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think there is authority to that effect. I will look and see.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will give the gentleman an opportunity.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve it while the gentleman is making his statement.

Mr. MONDELL. It occurs to me the item is not subject to a point of order. If the Chair will note——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so far agrees with the gentleman from Wyoming, unless the gentleman from New York can cite some authority that will change the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Very clearly this committee has authority to construct, improve, and repair roads within the boundaries of this national park. The item to which this is an amendment provides for the acquisition of land and for surveys, maps, constructing, improving, and maintaining avenues, roads, and bridges; and the Chair is entirely familiar with the rulings which make it in order to provide that of an appropriation made for a variety of purposes a certain amount may be used for some specific purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the Chair will look at section 3854, Volume IV, Hinds' Precedents, those are the authorities that apply. This amendment is mandatory. This is an affirmative direction to spend a certain amount on a certain road.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must be perfectly familiar, as the Chair is, with numerous provisions in appropriation bills providing that a certain amount of an appropriation shall be spent for a certain purpose, and the Chair never has known a provision of that sort to be held subject to a point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. The estimate submitted by the Gettysburg National Commission for maintenance and for the work essential in the park during the next fiscal year have all been allowed by the Committee on Appropriations. Every dollar asked by that commission has been included in the bill. This matter could not have been of such importance or desirability as to necessitate our action, because the commission did not request it. In view of the fact that no information has been submitted and the commission did not ask for the money, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. BEALES. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from New York, I wish to state that the commission in charge of the national park at Gettysburg made a request for this amount of money for these roads and asked me to introduce a bill in the House, which I did, and a favorable report upon it has been made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I presume it was the Committee on Military Affairs that reported the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEALES] introduced it. That bill provided that this improvement should be made and that the money for it should be appropriated. I suppose that bill went to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was reported to the House by the proper committee. It came up once or twice in the House on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I do not think anybody else except myself was prepared to object to it. I asked to have it passed over because I thought if an appropriation were to be made, it ought to be made in the sundry civil appropriation bill, where it belongs. That is, an appropriation for this purpose ought to be made in this bill and not in a separate bill. I supposed that the Committee on Appropriations were willing, because, as far as I knew, they had no objection to the passage of that special bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no very pressing need for it. Commissions and heads of departments will approve any proposition submitted to them for the spending of money, but when they are required to submit estimates in accordance with law for the moneys that should be requested from Congress for necessary purposes during the fiscal year, they then do not ask for money which it is not highly important that they should have. Of course if they are asked whether they approve a proposed expenditure, they say yes. Now, they did not ask for this money in their estimates. Congress has treated the Gettysburg National Park very generously and never refused any money that that commission asked from Congress and said was necessary. I think we ought not to force money upon them for the purpose of approving requests which they never made until a Member of Congress suggested to them that it would be a good thing to appropriate the money. We can not conduct the business of the Government in that way. If we did, we could not raise enough money to pay the bills that would be imposed upon us.

Mr. MANN. Now, if I may use a little of my time——

Mr. FITZGERALD. We need the money for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will give the gentleman my time.

Mr. MANN. I have the floor. The Committee on Military Affairs, having jurisdiction of this bill, reported it favorably. It would have passed, so far as the Committee on Appropriations are concerned——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I had to be away, and I asked the gentleman if he was going to object to it, and he said he was. If not, I should have had somebody else object to it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman had nothing to do with it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That happened, at any rate.

Mr. MANN. I supposed the gentleman was perfectly satisfied to let this bill pass. I thought the gentleman came to me to remove my objection to the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Did the gentleman ever know me to prevail upon him to withdraw his objection to any bill?

Mr. MANN. It was a proper matter for the Committee on Appropriations to include in the sundry civil bill. I supposed that the gentleman was in favor of exercising jurisdiction and of having this item included in the sundry civil bill on the floor, and I suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEALES], the author of the bill, that the proper way to do was to offer an amendment on the sundry civil bill. I am taken utterly by surprise by the attitude of the gentleman from New York now.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this controversy is entirely as to the method to be pursued to secure the necessary funds to build these roads through the Gettysburg National Park. There seems to be no question about the necessity of the roads nor about the amount to be appropriated. The objection seems to be because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEALES] introduced a bill instead of having the commission include this amount in their estimate which was handed to the Committee on Appropriations. I do not believe we ought to split hairs on the method when the funds are actually needed for proper and necessary improvements. It is not likely that the commissioners of the park would have asked for this appropriation had they not seen the absolute need of it. I believe that the membership of this House are sufficiently acquainted with the national park at Gettysburg so that they should not reject this amendment. I can not see any good reason why the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] should oppose the amendment simply upon the ground that the commissioners did not ask for the appropriation when they made their estimates, which would have secured the inclusion of the appropriation in this bill. I hope the amendment will be adopted and the money forthcoming, so that the road can be built for the improvement of this park, which is one of the sacred spots in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEALES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BEALES) there were—ayes 18, noes 23.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEALES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the amendment that has just been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

Yellowstone National Park: For maintenance and repair of improvements, $135,000, including not to exceed $7,500 for maintenance of the road in the forest reserve leading out of the park from the east boundary, and not to exceed $10,000 for maintenance of the road in the forest reserve leading out of the park from the south boundary, to be expended by and under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no portion of this appropriation shall be expended for the removal of snow from any of the roads for the purpose of opening them in advance of the time when they will be cleared by seasonal changes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 74, at the end of line 3, insert the following:

"And including not exceeding $5,000 for purchase, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-driven and horse-drawn vehicles to be used for inspection of roads and road work."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement, care, and maintenance of various reservations, including maintenance, repair, and operation of two motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes, $30,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 76, line 9, after the word "repair," insert the word "exchange," and after the word "of" at the end of that line insert the words "one horse-drawn and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement and maintenance of Judiciary Park, $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I noticed the other day that some law officer of the Government—I suppose the proper one; I do not remember whether it was the Attorney General or not—in reference to the Smithsonian grounds, held that they were not public grounds in the city of Washington. The Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds submitted to the Attorney General, or some other law officer of the Government, the question whether the Smithsonian grounds were under his control and came within the law that prohibited the erection of public buildings on these grounds without the consent of Congress. The decision was that the grounds did not come within the prohibition; that the Smithsonian Regents could do what they pleased on the grounds. I had supposed that the Smithsonian grounds were public grounds. We appropriate for their maintenance, and I supposed that we appropriated for their maintenance under the care and control of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, but possibly it is through the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not familiar with the decision to which the gentleman refers. I have assumed that the Smithsonian grounds were a part of the Mall and that they were under the control of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds. The parkway act relative to the District, as I recall, makes all public places a part of the park system and under the care of the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt that a decision was rendered. The question arose in connection with the desire of the Smithsonian Institution to erect an art gallery, I think.

Mr. FITZGERALD. For the Frear art collection?

Mr. MANN. Yes; and the matter came before Col. Harts, who submitted it to the law officer of the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution on several occasions when discussing the proposition of a building for the Frear collection expressed the hope that Congress would consent that the building which Mr. Frear intended to make provision for his collection would be located on a site within the Smithsonian grounds.
